PREFACE.

THE Compiler of this volume trusts that like a few words will suffice like explain the reasons which induced him to submit it to the public in its present shape.

It is an old observation that government is carried on by the nen in British India more than in any other country. The ruling body generally, therefore, is given to secret and official minute-writing than public speech-making. To this rule Sir Bartle Frere formed an exception, not that he wrote less, but that he spoke more in public than any of his colleagues in office. Whether Commissioner in Sind, Member of the Vice-regal Council, or as Governor of Bombay, Sir Bartle Frere scarcely ever let pass an opportunity of openly enunciating his views me those social, political, and economic questions of the day that seemed to him to call for settlement in the interests of India. His speeches are valuable account both of their matter and their manner. As to their matter, whatever difference of opinion may exist about the soundness of some of his views, this much will be admitted by all that Sir Bartle Frere propounder of puzzling paradoxes, stubborn advocate of exploded theories, but that he took a sober and common wiew of things, free from violence wextremes, not agreeing with many, perhaps, but differing also from few ;-in short, as said of him, he always travelled the precipices of men's opinions, and always escaped without a catastrophe. Next = to their manner, it is almost superfluous = remark wiews and opinions thus cautiously formed, illustrated and accompanied in their expression by a colPREFACE.

lateral research and literary and finish and pliancy of style which imparted them a peculiar freshness and novelty. The opinions which he advocated are destined to acquire higher ascendancy hereafter than they have yet attained. The late Governor of Bombay must, therefore, be regarded rather exponent of the more advanced views of the best of his time, we one indeed in the first rank of his contemporaries, whom he desired to raise to the realization of a noble ideal. It is hoped that these pages will furnish evidence of the truth of this view of his character and aims.

The Compiler is that this collection is not a perfect reflection of the views and opinions of Sir Bartle Frere and all the various and important public matters on which he had to think and deliver judgment. The Compiler has solely confined himself to the Speeches. His part in the work is small indeed, viz, classification and arrangement; but he trusts that his humble labours will be appreciated, if not for their sake, all events for that of their subject. He has to acknowledge with thanks his obligations to in friend Mr. Máhadeva Govind Ránadè, M. A., L. L. B., for the introductory notice in which he reviews Sir Bartle Frere's public career in India.

To His Highness the late Rawal Shri Sir Jaswantsingji Bhowsingji, K. C. S. I., Thakore Saheb of Bhownuggar, the Compiler's area acknowledgments and due, for the valuable assistance afforded him in the publication of the work, and in feels sincere pleasure in thus publicly recording his area of the obligation he is under to that enlightened and generous Prince.

INTRODUCTION.

THE Speeches which have been selected for publication in volume contain nearly that of permanent interest the matured utterances of Sir Bartle Frere during the last years of his active life in India.

The decade succeeding the mutinies has witnessed a unexampled progress in all that constitutes good government and material prosperity; and throughout these ten years. Bartle Frere occupied a prominent position before the public eye . statesman who combined in person all that manly and benignant in the character of the first generation of Anglo-Indian Governors, with the breadth of view and willingness to receive me impressions which the present time so peremptorily requires in those who would worthily rule in the head of affairs. Each individual Englishman, in the early days of quest, had to sustain his representative character before newly conquered races. Tremendous power for working mischief joined a resolute determination to hold that power as trust, - m benignant black cloud which intervened to protect country from evils than anarchy, and which in wown time would dissolve after vivifying the land with the seeds of higher and manlier life. Strong personal Government thus found favour with them being most in accordance with native habits, and the exigencies of foreign sway. Graduated authority, the division of the functions of sovereignty, free admission in the Natives of the country to advise and co-operate in their government as unfranchised fellow-subjects,—these wants in the pretimes of later growth, and it will be years before take deep root in the soil. The generous ambition help native population to elevate themselves, at teach them self-reliance and the strength of lawful combination, animates only a few of the same advanced Indian section in the present day, and of these select few, no seem felt more earnestly his grave responsibilities and acted up to his lights with more singleness of purpose than Sir Bartle Frere.

Endowed with varied intellectual gifts and an imagination which enabled him to realize the and manners of times the most removed as though he man them and lived in them, a native simplicity of heart, familiar acquaintance with native speech and usage, affable manners, and gift of speech which communicated its earnestness to the most indifferent listener. -all these rare gifts pointed him out as a who would not III to leave " his footprints on the sands of time," and make his name an heir-loom in the memory of grateful millions. Early in his life in this country, he came to feel for the Ryot population who love and regard which redeemed many a fault in his official career, and towards the decayed representatives of the old nobility of Maharashtra, he are chivalrous affection which refused to deal harshly with the ruins of the present, from of veneration for the past,—the gentle and mournful affection which makes the traveller tread lightly upon the mouldering fragments of cities in ruin. Early in his life he appointed to the charge of the Sattara Residency in the most critical period of the fortupes of that State. One year after appointment Battara, the reigning Prince Shahaji died, and in evil hour the greed of territory blinded the local Government to all just mem of its obligations towards that State. Sir Bartle Frere manfully struggled against great odds - prethe State from absorption, and man faltered for a moin pleading earnestly what justice and sound policy quired the bands of the paramount power. He was overborne, and the State annexed and entrusted to management as Commissioner. Sir Frere was largely influenced in the estimate he formed and the hopes he entertained of the capacity for progress in purely native administrations by experience Resident and Commissioner Sattara. He entered the service in 1833, when the memories of Elphinstone. Munro, Metcalfe, Malcolin, still fresh in the recollection of the people, and he gradually moulded his character upon their model. At Sattare, his native nobility of manners, openness of heart, and his chivalrous tenderness for fallen greatness, found their proper field. He had ample opportunity to study native society, high and low, in perhaps most advantageous light. Ample justice has not been done to the rare merit of Raja Pratap Sing and his brother Shahaji. Raja Pratap Sing, especially, ruler born, a more selfdenying prince, a more considerate prince, never sat many royal throne. The order and discipline he maintained all over his territory was the marvel of his times. Throughout the long discussion which took place here and in England, before Sattara annexed, there is not a single argument drawn from the ordinary claptrap of native misrule and disorder, and there is much positive testimony muthe other side, if indeed, the Roads and the Bridges, and the Dharmashalas which were in such excellent condition when Sattara lapsed to the British Government, the Courts of Law, the active Police superintendin which he took a special interest, the Survey and the Census of the entire Territory under him, and the encouragement to learning which he gave, are not testimonies enough speak in his favour. Sir Bartle Frere's residence Sattura brought him thus into intimate contact with the best characteristics of native society, and he there formed his lasting acquaintances with his numerous friends among the native aristocracy. In the Durbar Speeches which form part of collection made, he most affectingly alludes to these old recollections, and shows the second of this influence become a part of his very nature, wholly possessed he seems to be times with the subject. The country of Maharasatra with its hill-forts, picturesque Ghauts, and their wild scenery, its brilliant history and its valorous people, these he loved, he loved to contrast them with the decay and ruin he saw all around him, and sought waken the dying embers to mew blaze of the many he caught glimpses of it in far-off visions of the future.

Even before he appointed to the Sattara Residency. Sir Bartle Frere and engaged along with the early pioneers of the Revenue Survey Settlement in extending to the Ryot peasantry the great blessings of a fixed and certain assessment. This was great work, the beneficial effects of which men felt throughout the country, and Sir Bartle Frere contracted a love for the new revenue system which stuck to him fast all through his stay in India, and when, after a quarter of a century, he came back to this Presidency he felt the honest confidence of early days in the revenue system, in the inauguration of which he had borne such considerable part. In one of his Speeches in the local Legislature about the time that Act I of 1865 was passed, he pays a most eloquent tribute to the names of the first origiof the measure, and when Native Chiefs to seek counsel of him, he always recommended them to introduce the Survey in their territory, and lost me time in forcing the good work in Native States, when circumstances permitted active interference.

Sir Bartle Frere as Commissioner in Sind had free scope allowed to him in carrying out great public works. His zeal in promoting them another distinguishing feature of his rule. II had an eminently hopeful and constructive genius, the first of the country a glance, and spared no pains interest the authorities in acheme of new roads and canals; so that in the short space of half a dozen changed entirely face of the country. He converted Karachi into a flourishing sea-port town, employed the robber Belooch tribes to dig the Begaree Canal, along the banks of which they settled in numbers, and laid the foundation of the first Railway in that Province, appointment seat in the Imperial Council first raised Bartle Frere from s provincial dignitary into a leading Indian statesman His great elevation seemed to come to him his natural belonging, - exactly could be rise to the height of his function. At Calcutta, Sir Bartle Frere, as a Member of the Executive government, and a leading debater in the Legislative Council, had a splendid opportunity of displaying his rare powers of speech, his reach of thought, and his extensive quaintance with Indian affairs. As a speaker, seldom member to have heard one who could so dignify the most common. place occasion. As he spoke, the soul seemed to beam forth in his expressive countenance, and the upheavings of the heart had earnestness about them, which was strangely contagious. His style, elevated on occasions combined simplicity of expression with a mus imagery, which seemed to be fitted into it in the most natural way. His Minutes too are masterly specimans in their way, so lucid in statement, a exhaustive in the views they present of the lights and shades of the subjects. that they seldom failed to work persuasion in the most casual reader. Sir Bartle Frere Member of the Legislative Council for nearly three years. It was the time of the subsidence of passions aroused by the mutinies, and the antagonism which that outbreak had developed could have found smoother counteracting influence as help-mate by the side of the sternly man magnanimity of "Clemency" Canning, than the innate temperance and the long cemented friendship appreciation of native character which Sir Bartle Frere in a preeminent degree possessed. The Rajmahal addresses, the great

This curious deduction became a settled principle with him, and in his five years' rule in this Presidency, it led him into many a position quite inconsistent with his general leanings—intellectual and sethetical. His arguments for the Cotton Frauds Bill, his pleadings in favour of the Time Bargains Bill, the casy nonchalance with which he yielded himself to the influences of a host of speculators, who deceived him with the promises of a New Frere City in reclaimed Island, even his overhopeful temper during the speculative times, and his support of the old Bank of Bombay, can be explained of the supposition his extreme anxiety for seeing this country develop its commercial relations with foreign countries.

Against these few shortcomings in his career, to be set the many sterling excellencies of his character which have briefly noticed. His appreciation of the Natives, his intimacy with me noble families, his honest fidelity to their great interests, his habitual judiciousness of temper, his wish to the Natives grow in loyal mauliness of temper, the steady attempts he made to open for them a higher sphere of duties and honours, all these will enshrine him in the hearts of many me model ruler and a kind governor.

Lastly, his encouragement of scholarly tastes and liberal culture among the ranks of the educated Natives was not the least of his many claims upon the national admiration. His Addresses to the University state documents, where he deliberately put himself forward as a prophet and a teacher, and embraced in his vision all the future and all the past, contrasting their lights and shades with the dimly sum but hopeful present. The Speech in which he advocates the independence of the Indian Universities is a specimen of class of elecution very rare in this country. These annual Addresses treats, and their moral influence upon the hearts of the listeners will fade away. He had the sight of disarming opposition by the magic of his sweet face and open speech, and the earnest-ness strangely infectious.

The Frere Town is a fairy dream, the Reclamation schemes have turned out abortions, the years which were to place the head of the cities of Asia, have brought low in the humiliation; but the prophet, though falsified in his time, will not, so long his gentle elevating influence is among us, fail to reap a reward in time not distant, when under better auspices his most magnificent visions be surpassed by the reality of position.

PART I. DURBAR SPEECHES.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIE H. B. E. FREER K. C. B., GOVERNOR BOMBAY, held a Durbar at Poons, on the 4th September 1865, for the reception of the Sirdars and Chiefs of the Deccan, and other Chiefs and Native Gentlemen.

These, together with the principal Civil and Military Officers of the station, having assembled, Excellency the Governor accompanied by the Honorable B. H. Ellis, member of the Executive Council, entered the Durbar, attended by Mr. James Gibbs, the Agent for Sirdars in the Doccau, Mr. F. S. Chapman, Mr. C. Gonne, Secretaries to Govt.; Mr. Vinayakrao Vasudevaji, Oriental Translator to Govt., and other Officers of the general and personal Staff, and took his seat under the usual salute.

Chiefs and Sirdars,—I me glad to welcome you to Poona,—to hear from you of the welfare of yourselves and your families,—to receive the expressions of your attachment to the Government of our great Sovereign Queen Victoria; to me you meet many gentlemen who are engaged in all branches of the administration of the country and to have more opportunity of assuring you of your Sovereign's desires for the happiness and prosperity of her Indian dominions.

There are many subjects of importance to you collectively and individually, which I trust we may have opportunities of discussing before you leave Poona. But there matters of greatest interest to mall; m which I should be glad to say more to you than it is possible to say, either in a general address to you in Durbar or in one on two necessarily brief and formal private interviews. Among these topics there is much which I should be glad to say on the subject of Education. Education I do not mere reading and writing. Without these elementary means of acquiring knowledge there can be perfect education. But much may be learnt from travel-from seeing other countries and conversing with men of wider experience and was knowledge than can be met with any place. There is much to be learnt in a visit to Bombay or Poona, or in any distant city a country. I know that the expense of travelling with m great retinue is m serious obstacle to such journey, and I wish you would imitate the excellent example of His Highness the Scindia, and His Highness the Holkar, who have visited many countries with | larger retinue than absolutely necessary for seeing with advantage all that worthy of visit.

I would gladly write than can be said orally on this subject of Education, but I find from the reports of Political Officers that very large proportion of the Maratha Chicfs are unable to read and write their own language; and there are very few indeed who know the language of the English Government and the English Sovereign sufficiently well to understand what I might say or write to them in my own tongue.

I need not remind you that I have known and of you for many years; and that in some cases my acquaintance with you and with your families is of nearly 30 years' standing. During that period I have taken a warm and unceasing interest in you and yours, and in the class to which you belong, and it is a great disappointment to me to find that, with very rare exceptions, the Sirdars of the Decean and not better instructed either in the language of their Government, or even in the language and literature of their own people, than they man when I first knew them. I would earnestly beg you to consider whether this is creditable to yourselves consistent with your duty to yourselves, to your families, or to your subjects? To yourselves, because without such knowledge you cannot efficiently the high station to which you work born you cannot fulfil your duty, we deserve the respect of your people, the sympathy of your Government.

You know that it is the earnest desire of Her Majesty the Queen, and of the Government of India, to maintain the class of Nobles to which you belong with undiminished hereditary property and influence and to see them act | leaders of the people in the moral and physical advancement which it is the eminent desire of the British nation to encourage in this country. But this is simply impossible if you neglect all opportunities of learning. I would ask you, if one of the Princes,—the most of Queen Victoria.—came amongst us, how many of you would be able to converse with His Royal Highness in his own language? How many of you read the laws of the country in the language in which they menacted? the correspondence of our Government regarding yourselves and your own rights? Nay more-how many of you could tell traveller if he spoke your language, anything of the history or geography of the people, m politics of any, part of your country beyond the immediate neighbourhood of your own territory?

The Government of England has of late years decreed that active share in the Government of this country shall be given to the people of this country as far as they worthy of it. You have good reason to know that this is no more figure of speechfor we have done me best to promote worthy men among the Native community to the highest seats in and Council, and to the Bench of our great Courts of Justice. We would gladly select for such officers. illustrious for their birth and descent-and influential from their rank and family position. How in it, then, that me have been able to find among the Sirdars of the Deccan so few who possess such a knowledge of their people and their own public affairs, - to be fitted for such - trust? There - hbnorable exceptions, sufficient to show how easy it would be for you to avail yourselves of this great opportunity-how much good you might do to your own people, and how much, moreover you might reflect upon yourselves, and your own houses. I have sat in Council at

The Durbar MM at Belgaum. 1865.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE, K. C. B., GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY, held m Durbar at Belgaum on the 28th November 1865, for the reception of the Sirdars and Chiefs of the Southern Marutha Country, and other Chiefs and Native Gentlemen.

These, together with the principal Civil and Military Officers of the station, having assembled, His Excellency the Governor, accompanied by the Honorable B. H. Ellis, member of the Executive Council, entered the Durbar, attended by Mr. W. H. Havelock, the Political Agent in the Southern Maratha Country; Mr. F. S. Chapman, the Chief Secretary to Government; Major F. J. Oldfield, the Assistant Political Agent; Mr. Vinayakrao Vasudevaji, the Oriental Translator to Government, and other Officers of the general and personal Staff, and took his seat under the usual salute.

His Excellency was supported to the left by the Honorable B. H. Ellis, Mr. L. Reid, the Collector of Dharwar, Brigadier General A. T. Heyland, C. B., Commanding at Belgaum, Captain A. C. Way, the Acting Political Superintendent of Sawant Woree, and the Officers of the Belgaum Brigads. Phoond Sawant Anna Sabeb and his three brothers, sons of the Chief of Sawant Woree, occupied seats on the same side. On the right, His Excellency was supported by Mr. W. H. Havelock, the Political Agent, Mr. A. E. D. Grey, the Collector of Belgaum, and Major F. J. Oldfield, the Assistant Political Agent.

Abdul Kheir Khan, Nawab of Savanoor.
Dhodirao Tatia Saheb, Chief of Songlee.
Ganpatrao Tatia Saheb, Chief of Meeraj.
Lakshumanrao Anna Saheb, of Meeraj.
Raghunathrao Dada Saheb, Chief of Koorundwar.
Ramchandrazuo Appa Saheb, Chief of Jamkhandi.
Ramrao Rao Saheb, India of Ramdurg.
Ganpatrao Bapu Saheb
Vinayakrao Appa Saheb
Vinayakrao Aba Saheb.

There were also present many Sirdars of the second and third Classes, and Native Gentlemen and Officers of the station.

The Sirdars and Chiefs of the First Class ——— conducted to their seats by the Political Agent and his Assistant and the Oriental Translator to Government.

I have much pleasure in welcoming you in Durbar, and in conferring the usual investiture of succession on the of you who have not previously received it at the hands of my predecessors. It has been a great gratification to that I have been able to visit your province, the natural capabilities of which in many respects second to none in India, fertile, and well watered, and inhabited by active, industrious, peaceable population, peculiarly apt for the pursuit of agriculture and commerce.

Two characteristics especially strike a stranger in this province. It bears every where marks of its historical fate in having been for centuries the battle and of contending dynasties of having formed at various times the frontier province of the rulers of Becjapoor, of Sattara, of Kolapoor, of Poona, and of Mysore. It is perhaps on this account that ___ find here what is so often wanting elsewhere in India, a large and powerful body of hereditary Chiefs, who have preserved unimpaired the means of influencing the people around them in peace, - they were wont in former times to do in war. Many of you have had personal experience of the earnest desire of the British Government from the time of Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone and Sir John Malcolm, down to that of Sir George Clerk, my immediate predocessor, not only to continue unimpaired your rights, privileges, and properties, but to aid you in exercising the influence which your power gives for the benefit of all around.

I had lately the pleasure of congratulating His Highness the Maháraja of Kolapoor* on having shown himself, after a long probation, worthy to the time of his predecessor, and previous to his own coming of age, had, as you all know, - often been prey to every form of misgovernment and confusion. I found His Highness not only himself able to in English with English gentlemen most topics of public and private interest, but carefully training up under his eye, and in his palace, a class of young chiefs. the sons of all the principal officers of his state, who will have the good an English education as His Highness himself received under the paternal care of the Political Agents who have been Regents of his state, from Colonel Douglas Graham and Mr. Anderson to Mr. Havelock. I found every department of the state well superintended by His Highness in person, and every visible mark of justice being duly administered, and of the people being well governed, prosperous, and contented. I hear from Mr. Havelock and Major Oldfield of other Sirders, now present, of whose administration the same may be said, and I know you all express anxiety to the British Government and to obey its wishes. But it to me that some of you hardly the way in which this laudable desire to be put in practice. You would all willingly lead your forces into the field at the call of Government. But this province is a frontier province no longer, and he that would find the foreign enemies of the British Government must go far beyond Poons or Mysore, and must seek our foes beyond Attock - on the borders of Chins, Far he it from me to urge you to forget the material ranown of the races from which you spring. Some of your ancestors have been than passive allies of the British Government. The great ancestor of one of your principal houses commanded side by side with the illustrious Wellesley before the walls of Seringapatam, and I would not wish you to fall one jot behind your forefathers in the qualities which made them successful soldiers. But what I wish you to observe is, that the altered circumstances of India man require that those same qualities which made your forefathers successful soldiers should me be manifested on a different field of action. The great imperial power of Her Majesty the Queen of England renders it unnecessary that any of you should entertain a single soldier for defence against the inroads of your neighbours. The power forbids you to attempt aggression for purposes of your own aggrandisement. Loyalty, courage, self-denial, still as necessary in the character of a great Chief, but they have a different work to do, and what I wish you to understand is, that every armed man whom you entertain beyond what is needed for purposes of police and internal administration, is much waste of your power and resources, which may bring you into undeserved trouble. but can be necessary for your own honor or usefulness. The vast defensive works which work every great mountain, and the ruins of which meet the eye in almost every large town in this province, are no longer needed for your safety; but there is w wide field before you in which the constructive abilities of your architects may find ample scope. Though it is no longer sarv to build forts, you may rival the Pándoo heroes of your early history by cutting roads over mountain gorges, and building bridges unfordable streams. You may emulate Asoka by works of irrigation, or of shelter for travellers, or by building hospitals for the sick and needy, and your may be remembered with gratitude by future ages, when all tradition of the mere fighting chieftains of former days shall have passed away.

To Brahmins it is hardly necessary that I should insist me the general claims which learning and letters have on your attention; but here again there we are two points which I cannot but notice. Some of the Sirdars have made most creditable progress in learning the language and literature of England, but means seem rather disposed to think that they can devote vicarious attention to these matters. I find here in Belgaum what is called a Sirdars' School, most liberally endowed by the Sirdars of the Southern Maraths Country, but instead of being School, as Kolapoor, where young Sirdars may be trained in the knowledge which will fit them for their future rank in life, the School seems to be devoted mainly the education of the nominess of Sirdars, mostly the sons of pauper Brahmins, whose main object in mecessarily be to a subsistence by the mercenary pursuit of letters. Government has lately selected a gentleman for the charge of this School, and I hope that before leaving Belgaum you will consult with your excellent friend, Havelock, and so arrange the Principal, when he will have pupils whose future rank in life such as to demand the best education can give them. Here, elsewhere in India, the classes whence drawn many of your scribes and dependents largely availing themselves of the facilities they now for acquiring that learning which, in peacable and well-ordered community, is often the key of wealth and power. Even their women, after centuries of darkness, are beginning to emulate their predecessors of ancient times, when royal and noble ladies were thought unworthy of their rank if ignorant of letters. In all these respects let entreat you not to be left behind by those who must your equals in the social scale.

I find that, with one two notable exceptions, though the province has been for more than forty years under the British Government, none of you have ever visited Bombay or even Poons. I hope this will be no longer the ease, but that I shall have the pleasure of seeing you in Bombay, and of assisting you to see all there that is most worthy of your attention.

One great obstacle is the expensive custom of travelling with a retinue as large as in the days when a armed force needed for defence in travelling. This is no longer necessary, and if you would reduce your escorts to what is really useful for your own comfort and convenience, the expense of long journey would cease to be no obstacle to your enjoying the pleasures and advantages of travel.

After the reception had taken place, His Excellence Bartle Frene addressed His Highness the Raja of Kolapsor, in English, as follows:—

RAJA RAM CHATTRAPATHI MAHARAJ,- I cordially welcome your Highness to Poons, and I regard your visit m a great consolation for the gricf with which the Government heard of the death of His Highness the late Raja. Your Highness has succeeded as his son, to a great and inheritance. As the head of man ancient house so famous in Maratha history, m ruler of many fair provinces and of hundreds of thousands of subjects, whose happiwill depend my greatly on the manner in which you rule them, you have heavy responsibilities early laid upon you, and I heartily pray that God may give you strength and wisdom to sustain them. You have, to assist you, the good example of His late Highness, and the excellent system of government already established, the aid, of tried and faithful servants like Ram Rao and your other ministers, and above all the constant assistance and advice of an experienced Resident, Colonel George Sligo Anderson, who is already well known to you by his able services in other parts of the Southern Maratha Country, and who will, I - sure, speedily secure your entire confidence, m he has earned that of the British Government. I would earnestly exhort you to regard him as your best friend, and to refer to him all your doubts and difficulties, whatever they may be, remembering what you have heard the State of Kolapoor owed to Colonel Douglas Graham when your predecessor was a minor, and limitater, what you have yourself seen of the confidence, which existed between his late Highand Mr. Havelock. I trust, at me distant period, to hear from Colonel Anderson that he considers you capable of conducting the whole administration without the intervention of a regency. But I would beg your Highness to remember that this period will be hastened or retarded according we your apply yourby his late Highness. It agreet of pleasure learn that since, I had the pleasure of seeing you | Kolapoor, less than wear ago, you had made such progress in your studies that you wished me to address you in English, and that you prepared to reply in the language. I glad to infer from this circumstance that you are fully alive to the fact that the office of ruler of Kolapoor is mempty honor-no agreeable pageant, and it is certain that the British Government will not entrust the active powers of administration to any itill they have all the security for a wise use of those powers which good education and proved disposition can afford. I would in the meantime have you constantly bear in mind that no former Raja of Kolapoor over succeeded to dignities or responsibilities equal to yours. However absolute their power, it was circumscribed within a very short radius from their capital. None of them could have ventured as far - you have from your capital without fear of domestic treachery or foreign violence. There and men alive who can tell you what the dangers in their early days of a visit from Kolapoor to your ancestor's capital at Sattara, to his minister's capital at Poons. But wherever your Highness now goes you move under the signs of British power, with no retinue than you require for purposes of convenience state. You may travel unarmed from Cashmere to Cevlon, and no man can let or hinder you with impunity. Nay, more, you may in like manner visit any civilized country in the world, in the farthest parts of Europe - America, and you will everywhere be received and protected, not merely with the hospitality due to sovereign prince, but as one entitled to the protection of the whole power of the British Empire. And this you have obtained at no other sacrifice than and of the power to do evil with in bunity. There at time when your predecessors could exercise any amount of oppression over their subjects, and no power in India could call them to account. Such license of oppression exists no longer. But there is nothing which a good Rajs of Kolapoor could have done which you may not now do; and if the Raja's power to do evil has been limited, me power to do good and his responsibility for the exercise of that power have been immensely increased. I know but of two conditions to the enjoyment of this power. They are fidelity to the British Crown, and the obligation to govern your subjects well. I am convinced that mexhortation of mine is needed to impress vour Highness vour advisors your responsibilities in both respects; and I draw from the example of your lamented predecessor the that you will be we less anxious to deserve the character of a faithful ally of Her Majesty the Sovereign of the British Empire than to follow her example, we beneficent and beloved ruler, were protecting the rights of all her subjects, and tempering justice with mercy. I have were the Viceroy's permission to recognise your Highness as the adopted of the late Raja of Kolapoor, and his successor; and may God give you grace to reign long, and wisely, and happily the people committed to your charge.

At the conclusion of this address a Poshak was given to His Highness the Raja, and a salute of seventeen guns was fired. His Highness replied in English to His Excellency the Governor follows:—

YOUR EXCELLENCY,-I thank you most heartily for the kind welcome you have given me, and the great honor which I have received at your Excellency's hands in this auspicious day. I beg that your Excellency will convey her Most Gracions Majesty amount of my loyal devotion to the Crown, and my desire to fill worthily the high position to which by Divine Providence I have succeeded, under the Sovereign of this great Empire. I feel deeply sensible of the responsibilities which have fallen on me, and how much will be needed on my part to them in a way which will do honor to the memory of the illustrious Prince whose early loss we deplore. The words of advice spoken by your Excellency to-day can be effeced from my memory, and and guide and cheer me in the arduous path before me, as the words of a revered parent who has carnestly in heart the honor and happinese of the ancient house of Shivaji, and the welfare of the nobles and people attached it. Knowing how much the principality of Kolapour owes to the care and protection of the Government, will always be my duty to we be Political Agent my Court we counsel and encouragement. I esteem myself especially fortunate in having so and experienced a gentleman as Colonel Anderson to advise and befriend and on entering on the duties of my high station, and the British Government, and the continued friendship and protection of the British Government, to hand down unimpaired the great inheritance to which I have this day succeeded.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOE then received the Nazzar of the Raja of Jawar, and in giving him his Poshak, addressed him in Marathi = follows:—

RAJEY MALHABRAO SAHEB,- I have much pleasure in complying with the orders of the Viceroy of India in Council by secepting your nazzerana; and investing you as Raja of Jawar, in recognition of your adoption by the widow of the late Raja. In wishing you long life to enjoy, and strength to fulfil the duties of your high position. I have m few words to add in the way of advice to those around you, and I trust that what I now say will be borne in mind, and in due time explained to you when you shall be of age to give effect to it. Your principality, surrounded by unhealthy and inaccessible jungles, has been long = secluded from neighbouring provinces, that it was rarely visited by strangers, and before the late Raja's time few of your predecessors had ever left their own territories. Two railways pass through. close to the Jawar country. They have already multiplied manifold the value of your estates, and have created for you and your subjects new ____ of wealth, ___ liabilities, and new rights. I am glad to be assured that your people an already advancing in wealth and intelligence. They already require a better fiscal and judicial administration than the primitive system which has sufficed for so many centuries, and this you must me prepared to give them. I trust that the Lady Gopikabaee, who will rule till you are of age, will see that you me trained so as to enable you to do this, and that you me taught that the good government of your principality, which cannot be ensured without your personal superintendence, is the man condition an which the British Government recognises your adoption as the heir of the Raja's family and of his honors, and that this condition will be strictly enforced, not according to the requirements of the ancient circumstances of the State, which no longer exist, but in accordance with what the British Government considers necessary for its subjects under its direct rule in districts similarly situated. Let \(\text{le be your aim not to maintain obsolete customs suited to less civilised times, but \(\text{rule your people so justly and mercifully, and with such regard \(\text{their rights, as shall render them as prosperous as contented as the people in the neighbouring districts under direct Governments.

RAGHUSATHEAO VITHAL,—I have great pleasure in presenting to you by command of His Excellency the Viceroy and Grand Master of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, a Grant under Her Majesty the Queen's Sign Manual conveying to you indignity of a Companion, together with the Insignia of the said Order. This mark of Her Majesty's favour will, I trust, be regarded by you, by your family, and by the Chiefs of the Deccan as a proof of Her Majesty's approval of the good example you and your family have shown to your fellow-countrymen, and of Majesty's goodwill to the influential class to which you belong. Your father has left a name in history as one of the bravest, most faithful, and most respected among the adherents of the late Peishwa. fidelity to a falling dynasty, he yet so bore himself that he won the respect of the Honourable Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone and Sir John Malcolm; and to his example and arrangements you will it that you and your brothers have been trained to be a credit to your and class. Your own Jagheer is a model of good management, and your two brothers, one - a native Judge* and the other an additional Member of the Council of the Governor of Bombay for making Laws and Regulations, have rendered good service to our Government. I earnestly hope that your example may be followed by many others of the Sirdars of the Deccan, and that they will bear in mind that there are roads of honor yet open to them, if they would follow your example by consulting their true interests, and those of the people dependent - them.

The Chief of Vinchur replied:-

Your Excellency,—Words adequately express how highly I value and esteem the great honor which has been conferred on me by Her Gracious Majesty the Queen in enralling as a Companion of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India. In gracious token of Her Majesty's favour will, I assure your Excellency, units and closely than the house of Vinchur to the Crown of Great Exitain, and sturulets the members my family greater exertions in the service of the Government with which we have the day been a honourably associated.

Mr. Abdeolla David Sassoon having been in manner introduced, His Excellency The Governor addressed him as follows:—

Mr. Sassoon,— It is with peculiar pleasure, that I obey the command of Her Majesty and the Viceroy in conveying to you. Her Majesty's royal grant of the dignity of the Most Order of the Star of India, together with the Insignia of the Order. recognises you as the worthy successor of one of those men to whom Bombay its position among the most famous commercial marts of the East.—a man whose career gave strength and dignity the community in which he dwelt, and whose position in community was in itself - result of which - British Government of might well be proud. To up a fortune like his, a commercial repute such as he enjoyed, bespeak in m great mercantile community abilities and virtues of mordinary kind; his fortune he used it, affords bright example to and than generation. It is no exaggeration say that while the poor and the needy, the infirm, will they whose early being has been blighted by evil example and crime-while all these objects of compassion exist in this land, the seeme of your father, Mr. David Sassoon, cannot well be forgotten. It one peculiar feature in his career that from the first he cast in his lot unhesitatingly with the British rule in this country, and while he abated nothing of his love for his ancient people and his ancient faith, he ever felt a peculiar pride in being subject of the British Crown, and furnished a striking example of the strength of those bonds which knit together so many races, such widelysevered countries, and such different creeds - form the Empire of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. In you we recognise worthy son and representative of me whom we all venerated, and I trust that the honors now conferred m you by Her Majesty am but an earnest of those which await you and your race in India.

After receiving the Ineignia of the Order, Mr. Sassoon replied of follows:

Your Excellency,—In receiving this token of the dignity Her of Gracious Majesty has been pleased to confer upon me and upon my family, I am fully that it is to no merit of my own, but to the name of an honoured father whose footsteps, by the sid of the Almighty, I shall ever endeavour to follow, that I this high distinction; but, Sir, viewing the circumstances which brought me, whilst still a boy, I land of my adoption, the blessings which have my residence under protection of the British Government—the cordial reception I in England, the courtesy shown to me by the representatives of the Queen at various in Europe, the unvarying kindness of successive Governors of Bombay and of your Excellency in particular, I should indeed be ungrateful if I feel a pride in being a subject of Crown. May I request your Excellency to convey Majesty the high appreciation on the part of myself and my family of the honor conferred upon us all by the grant of this dignity to me, and at Majesty time to assure the Queen of undiminished loyalty of our ancient people residing in this portion of the dominions.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FREEE, then addressed the three Companions of the Order thus:—

GENTLEMEN. I have now endeavoured to the best of my power to obey the commands laid on me by Her Majesty, and by Her Vicercy, the Grand Master of the Order, in conveying wyou these grants and insignia. I would a svery few words regarding the dignity which has just been conferred on you. It will have, I persuaded, a double efficacy in not only rewarding past merit and services, but in stimulating the recipients and all who witness or hear of these honors to fresh exertions. true of the military characteristics of any order | knighthood little remains but the high of honor which the military profession, perhaps than almost any other, has cherished. But knighthood has cessed to be exclusively military, only because we may now practise in other professions and walks of life those virtues for which in barbarous ages there was under the safeguard of the military profession. To ready to sacrifice life or limb, or property for the truth, to svery worldly advantage subservient to loyalty to the Soveraign, bear hardship, and to sacrifice selfish pleasure and profit in of justice mercy for the sake of the poor and the helpless, and especially for those whose sex leaves them dependent un the strength and courage of men-all these, which were privileges or virtues of the military knight of old, are now, know, enjoyed and practised by many who never set lance in rest or took sword in hand. In admitting you and your countrymen to the privileges, and in laying we you the responsibilities which belong to an Order of Knighthood, Her Majesty the Queen of England you to a brotherhood which has its representatives and privileges in every civilized country in the world. You who have travelled of India can testify that in any country of Europe or America ribbon and insignia of this Order will be a guarate for some portion of the respect and esteem not merely of the great and noble, but of the good and brave and that the bare fact of your belonging to this Order will be taken as proof of your possessing some of those many claims to the love or respect of mankind, without the presumed possession of which received honor be the hands or by the command of Queen Victoria. It is not likely lever again have opportunity of meeting the Chiefs and Princes of the Decean and Southern Maratha Country gathered together in Durbar; I will therefore now take leave of you all with my fervent wishes for future welfare, and carnest expression of my hope that hereafter many of your may be found inscribed on the roll of such honors some of you have this day received. May you who have been distinguished, live to enjoy and augment those honors, and in the words of the motto of the Order—"May Heaven's Light be your Guide."

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. EBERE, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., held Durbar at the Frere Hall, Karachi, on the 1st. January 1867, for the presentation of the Insignia and Grant of the Dignity of Companion of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, to Shot Naomal Hotichand of that city, for meeting the Municipal Commissioners, and of conferring rewards and distinguished Native Gentlemen.

These, together with the principal Civil and Military Officers of the station baving assembled, His Excellency the Governor accompanied by the Honorable B. H. Ellis, member of the Executivo Council entered the Durbar attended by Mr. Samuel Mansfield, C. S. I., the Commissioner in Sind, Mr. F. S. Chapman, Chief Secretary to Government, and other Officers of the general and personal staff, and took his seat under the usual salute.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR, after acknowledging the salutation of the assembly, requested Mr. F. S. Chapman, the Chief Secretary, and Major W. R. Lambert, Collector and Magistrate of Karachi, to introduce Shet Naomal Hotichand, which being done, His Excellency rose, and addressed him as follows:—

SHET NAOMAL HOTICHARD,—I have received from His Excellency the Vicercy and Grand Master of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, instructions to deliver to you a Grant under Her. Majesty's Sign Manual, conferring you the dignity of Companion of the said Order, together with the Insignia thereof," and in m doing I have been instructed "to omit no circumstance which may conduce to give dignity and honor to the occasion." It is not necessary that I should were dilate on the character magreatness of the distinction which Her Majesty thus confers on you. It admits you to a brotherhood which numbers among its members all that is most illustrious in members in India, the Sovereign and the Heir Apparent to the Throne, the Vicercy of this great dependency, the Heroes and the Statesmen who have contributed to acquire and maintain the Indian Empire, and the Princes most illustrious for their descent, most distinguished for their great qualities malers.

Of your claims to be enrolled in such noble company it is not necessary that I should here speak. Very recently in this Hall, the Acting Commissioner of the Province,* in announcing to you Her Majesty's gracious purpose, dwelt on your life-long devotion to the British Government; and I need not further describe the services which he then recounted, but I me personally glad of the opportunity of expressing my strong of the assistance I received from you during the troublous years of 1857-58. You had great influence amongst your countrymen, you possessed information drawn from every part of Northern and Western India. and you placed all unreceivedly at the disposal of Government. When many of your countrymen were appalled by the greatness of the danger, and believed that some catastrophe threatened the existence of the British Empire in India, you never faltered in your sagacious trust in the power of the British Government to uphold the cause of law and order, and had you been me of those brave Islanders who then fought for British supremacy, you could not have shown a more thorough confidence in the ultimate triumph of the British arms.

It is a great soums of pleasure to me in now leaving Sind before I take my final departure from India, to be permitted to make this honor my you in the presence of the Commissioner of the Province,† and of my colleague the Honorable B. H. Ellis, both of whom have laboured molong in Sind and mohighly appreciate your services. This honor will, I trust, be regarded by your countrymen in Sind not simply as modistinction conferred my your rersonally, but as movidence of the gracious regard of Her Majesty for this distant province, and for those commercial interests of which you may here be regarded matching representative among the native community.

^{*} A. D. Bebertson Esq., C. S. 📑 Samuel Manafeld, Req., C. S., C. 🔳 I.

There is one act of yours which I would me particularly allude a showing your just appreciation of the character of the British rule-and which will, I trust, find imitators among your countrymen. Few know better than yourself the power of the British nation in war, and their in all the arts of But you also know that there is in every Englishman's mind w strong conviction that and does not live by bread alone, and that there things more valuable than victory in battle or in commerce. You have not personally had the advantages of English education, and it is therefore the more remarkable that you should have determined to send your grandson (Mr. Alumai Trikamdass, B. A.), to what is, in your estimation, a distant land, there to acquire such = education = Indian University give, the principles by which the conduct of educated Englishmen is ruled. I trust on my return to Bombay to see conferred wyour grandson the distinction of a University degree, and I trust that God will grant you ■ long life, not only to enjoy your own honors, but to see them continued and augmented by those you leave behind you.

His Excellency then delivered to Shet Naomal Hotichand the under the Queen's Sign Manual and the Insignia of the Order, and his retiring, Major W. R. Lambert introduced the Municipal Commissioners, to whom His Excellency the Governor said as follows:—

GENTLEMEN THE MUNICIPAL COMMISSION,—I am glad the Collector has given this opportunity of meeting you again before I leave Sind and of expressing to you the great pleasure with which I have man the many Municipal improvements which have been carried out since I left Karachi in 1859.

The Commissioner has been good enough to explain me the various plans he has in contemplation for enlarging the Municipal constitution of this town. The capital of the province has not grown the simple arrangements which sufficed in former days,

The Municipal affairs of Karachi are m present regulated by Act 1850; but this enactment been found insufficient for the requirements town. It proposed therefore, m give to Karachi, a Municipal Act somewhat similar m Bombay Municipal Act m of 1865.

it is requisite that the Municipality should be placed wider and permanent footing. I will be very glad if before I leave Bombay, I am able to do anything towards giving legislative sanction to the manual he proposes.

Foremost amongst the present wants of Karachi is the provision of mample supply of good water. This appears to make almost the only great Municipal improvement which has not made much progress of late years; but from what the Commissioner told man, I make suggine that he will be able to select from among the plans before him make which will be effectual in giving the town of Karachi a sufficient supply of this great necessary of life, this most essential preliminary to make great sanitary improvements. It would, however, remind you that neither this ner any other really valuable additions to your present resources make attained without increased expenditure which must be provided for by increasing the income of the Municipality, and this cannot be effected without effort or sacrifice make behalf of those who will benefit by the improvements.

The Municipal Commissioners returning to their seats, Mr. Shokeyram, the Muktyarkar of Karachi was presented in His Excellency, who bestowed a very handsome loongee in waistband on him; Mr. Sayee Elluppa, the Fouzdar, followed and received a valuable shawl; Rassaldar Natha Khan and Subedars Goolam Hyder, Alladad, and Abdula, of the City and Rural Police, were also presented with loongees, all these native officers having been most favourably commended to in Excellency by their superiors. Then were presented the members of the Bar by Mr. W. M. P. Coghlan C. S.; the Deputy Educational Inspector Rao Saheb Narayan Jagunnath by Mr. J. G. Moore, C. S., and the Syads of Tatta, the two in of the Jam of Jokeas, and the Dufterdar by Major Lambert. The business of the day having been concluded, His Excellency bowed to the assembly, who again rose, while he and party took their departure under a salute of seventeen guns.

C., Companions of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, to conduct His Highness the Thakore Saheb of Bhownaggar to receive the Insignia and Grant of Dignity under the Royal Sign Manual, of Knight Commander of the Most Exalted Order of the of India, which was borne on a cushion by Mr. A. After His Highness had been introduced, .His Excellency THE Governor addressed Major Kratinge, V. C., C. S. I., Political Agent of Kattiswar, in English as follows:—

MAJOR KEATINGE,-I am glad of unexpected opportunity to express here the seat of this Government, and in the presence of my colleagues and of many of your fellow-servants, what I stated imperfectly to you when I lately touched on the coast of Kattiawar, and delivered into your hands the Insignia of the Order of the Star of India, with which Her Majesty's gracious favour had honoured you. I then briefly referred to the character you had unheld during wong and distinguished course of service Political Officer, who not only well represented the British Government the supreme authority in this part of Asia, but in its beneficent aspect meconscious of its responsibility for exercising power for the good of every and class within your reach. I reminded those who were then present, that this man no feature in your career. your control as Political Agent, he assured muthat few things struck him than the evidence which he everywhere found of your wise and kindly care for promoting the permanent improvement and prosperity of a noble country which had been long and completely desolated by war and misgovernment. You wisely fostered agriculture and commerce, had promoted works of irrigation and communication had made roads and bridges, and organized a steam ferry over the impassable Nerbudda. You had pointed ont where iron and coal might be found, and had erected iron furand forges with all the latest appliances from Staffordshire. Education and the administration of justice had had their full share of your attention and nothing had been neglected which could bring back the days when Boorhanpore and Mandoo were among the most civilized and wealthy cities in one of the most prosperous provinces in Asia. And all this was done mainly by and through the natives of the land in all their various ranks, chiefs - well as ryots, by stimulating and encouraging what was good in them, and not by imposing on them the law of a wise but stern task-master. You upheld the same character during your tenure of office - Resident at the Court of His Highness Javajirao Sindhia, Maharaja of Gwalior, G. S. C. I., and won the respect as well as the personal regard of His Highness the Maharaja and his Court. When after many years of separation Her Highness the Schandra Nawab Begam of Bhepal* unexpectedly met you at Poons, in 1864, there

Schandra Begam,—Your Highness is very welcome to thin Durbar. I have long desired to thank you for the services which you have rendered to the Queen's Government. You had to deal with misclated province about two-thirds the size of Ireland. This time last year there six or Kings in Europe who each ruled over a smaller than Kattiawar, and six at least who numbered a smaller population among their subjects than that of your province. tion. Many of these estates were, of course, small in extent and in power, and in political importance, but twelve of them exercised powers of life and death, and ground in groupects to kingdoms which are not the meanest among the independent States of modern Europe. Nor these rulers the mere chiefs of modern predatory hordes, recently settled the country they had occupied, the great Delhi empire fell to pieces. Some of your Chiefs and show pedigrees which run back for nineteen centuries, and extend over 400 generations, of which all that we certainly know is, that m far back m the light of authentic history guides us, there is little apparently fabulous about them. And this, | least, is certain, that you have in Kattiawar landed proprietors who tilled land in that province while the descendants of the Casars still ruled over the Roman empire, and that many who believe, with some show of reason, that their ancestors had fields of their own to in the province when Porus met Alexander on the frontier of India. And authentic records prove that there me few chiefs or landowners of mark in Kattiawar who did not hold some portion of their present lands and present rights when the merchants of Queen Elizabeth and King James were seeking precarious footing at Surat and Ahmedabad. Your difficulties, as the representative of a supreme but, comparatively, modern power, in dealing with such States, might have been loss had the people of Kattiawar been all of one race or creed: but in no part of India do I know a population waried. The ethnologist may still trace, by undoubted evidence of form and of language, and of persistent custom, the representative of the steppes of Tartary and the wilds of Africa, of Persia and Arabia, and of almost every known in Central and Western India. from the aborigines who im haunt their ancestral forests and mountain fastnesses, to the Englishman - American who has lately arrived from the far West. And almost every Indian form of religious belief is to be there found professed,- the Fetish worship of the aboriginal Bheel or Cooly, m of the fugitive African slave. rock-cut croed of Asoks on the mountain fastness of Girnar down to the latest mention of philosophical Vedantism, Mahometanism in every of its varied forms, and Gospel which is preached by the Christian Missionary. The almost insular position of Kattiswar which had helped to preserve so long and so unchanged such a varied population, we in itself no small element of difficulty. It singular that a peninsula with many excellent coasting harbours, with large rivers impassable ranges of mountains, should be so difficult of access, and I cannot better illustrate this difficulty than by the fact, that while I have been most anxious ever since my arrival in Bombay an Governor, more to visit and traverse Kattiawar, almost five years have past without my being able to carry out my wish, not because I was not most anxious to go, and you and your Chiefs anxious to receive me, but because the total absence of made roads would have required to devote many weeks to such a visit as I wished to pay, and in one year at least a local scarcity, which me greatly due to this want of roads, would have rendered a visit from the large camp required for such deliberate travel a serious aggravation of the local distress and scarcity of food - forage. But your great difficulty has always been the political anomalies of your position. Sixty years ago your great predecessor, Colonel Alexander Walker,* was hailed = deliverer from the almost intolerable rapacity and disorder consequent on annual Maratha invasion, and for a whole generation the mere fact that the representative of a civilised and powerful Government exercised a paramount influence over all these States and tribes, me enough to give a degree of peace and security which had long been unknown in the peninsula. Thirty years ago, when I first visited Kattiawar, it see still a frontier province of Indian Empire. That frontier has since advanced far beyond the great western desert and Sind to the mountains of Affghanistan, and the imperial sceptre of India has passed into the bands of the Queen of England. With this changed position have come new duties and new responsibilities, and obligations have been laid upon you and upon the Indian Government of this day which was unknown to me predecessors. And many of these duties and responsibilities are such as cannot be written in treaties, deduced from the position which the British held while they only one of several great powers in Western India. The policy of conciliation and arrangement which worked well amough in former days had ceased to be effectual before you came to Kattiawar, and your immediate predecessors had been fairly overwhelmed and broken down by the multiplicity of apneals in controversies for which no judge was provided. When there no definition of rights, no authoritative tribunal, and where appeal to could be permitted. system of ciliation must necessarily later to a dead lock, and the most devoted, just, and laborious of public must ultimately fail to satisfy disputants when patient hearing and good advice the only possible results of his intervention. On you devolved the duty of substituting administration of justice for one of simple conciliation; justice between the paramount power and chiefs, who for centuries had been sovereigns in something more than name; justice between those chiefs in their relations with each other; justice between the many sharers in sovereignty and property which the laws and customs of ages had sanctioned; justice as between the princes and their subjects, from whom our overshadowing power had withdrawn such rough redress as rebellion on foreign intervention might provide against domestic tyranny and oppression. Such a change you could not accomplish without much misunderstanding. and many disappointments, conflicting rights, and incompatible obligations had to be reconciled, and the losing party of necessity must have some just grounds for complaint where me common tribunal had man before existed. To your kindly temper, no less than to your sense of justice. I attribute the min which both chiefs and people becoming reconciled to the new order of things. These Chiefs find their really useful powers and dignity increased under your advice; they have tasted, by following your counsels and example, the royal pleasure of doing good; they have learnt that there are better attributes of sovereignty than harbouring outlaws, and they and their subjects alike appreciate an administration which, not content will exhorting the one party to do justice and do others to obey, shows them how justice may be done, not as _____ of personal favour, but habitually and almost of routine. I cannot call to mind a single branch of good administration which has not received effective attention from you; protection of life and property; the administration of justice and education* have all been promoted, not only by your own direct action, but by what is far better, by stimulating the action of the Chiefs - their eubjects, and in promoting public works and all that facilitates and intercommunication, you have bestowed benefits Kattiawar which chiefe and people will alike learn to appreciate. Time does not admit of my entering into the specific details of all that has been accomplished or proposed during your tenure of office. I will only express a hope that health and strength may be given you in Kattiawar, till a province, so full of historical and social interest, = rich in resources, but hitherto = separated from the rest of the world, and - distracted by internal divisions and misgovernment, has been fairly linked by you into the political and social system of Western India; and will proceed to deliver to Highness the Thakore of Bhownaggar those marks of Her Majesty's favour which have been carned by the wise government of his principality.

THARORE SAMES,— I have received the command of His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Laird Mair Lawrence, Bart., G. C. S. I., and G. C. B. Her Majesty's Vicercy and Governor General of India, and Grand Master of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, to present to your Highness the Boyal

The design of building is by Booth, Local Fund Engineer, and it will bear the designation of "Kratuste-Rahnumar" College, the foundation-stone which by Colonel William Warden Anderson, present Political Agent of Kattiawar, the Mark April 1868.

I have stated to Major Keatinge some of the reasons which make peculiarly glad that Her Majesty has conferred this high honour on a chieftain of Kattiawar, and I will briefly state a few of the which have led to your selection by Her Majesty's Government to receive this mark of Her Majesty's royal favour. Your ancestors have been distinguished for generations past, not more by the bravery in battle, and fidelity to their engagements which befits - Rajpoot Prince, than by their good and mild government, and the protection they have seen afforded to commerce. The first engagements of your ancestors with the British Government for the suppression of piracy, † In this service to humanity your ancestors nobly seconded officers of the East India Company; and the Thakores of Bhownaggar have for the last 60 years used all their power, by land well as by sea, to protect the peaceful trader and agriculturist. It traditionary policy of your race, your Highness and your immediate predecessors have effectively followed; and you have rendered Bhownaggar of the great ports of Guzerat. I regretted much that I was unable to comply with Major Kestinge's wishes by revisiting Bhownaggar, and seeing for myself in the improvements which have taken place since, as a very young man I enjoyed your grandfather's (His Highness Wajehsingji Vakhatsingji,) hospitality than thirty years ago in company with his and my old and valued friend Mr. William-Ramsay. The piers the muddy flats which impede to the port, the reads and the schools Major Keatinge assures me, all conspicuous marks of your Highness' good government and of your care for your people, and I have been especially glad to hear that your Highness supports here in Bombay many scholars from Bhownaggar in completing their education at these institutions which not easily provided, except in a large city like this. what I regard as the peculiar feature of your Highness' administration, which will. I believe, be productive of most good to your people. and will, I am sure, give most pleasure to Her Majesty's Government in a care you have wisely and consistently taken to improve the administration of justice, and to separate it from all that is purely executive. It is a great evil in an autocratic form of government when the purity and efficiency of the adminstration of justice depends on the personal character of the ruler. Even when the ruler is zealous and regular in the discharge of his judicial duties, his feelings become necessarily involved, he becomes the less a partisan, and under such an administration there are be no real right of appeal; but the is far when the ruler is indolent or irregular in the discharge of his judicial duties, and they me neglected or entrusted to irresponsible subordinates. Your Highness has an excellent example to the Chiefs of Western India in providing, otherwise than by personal attention, for the due discharge of your judicial duties. I have seen your printed Code of Regulations for the guidance of all your Courts, and I assured that it bodies much that is valuable and adapted to your dominions, in the spirit of the elaborate Codes of British India. Major Keatings tells me that you have appointed judicial officers, selected for their probity and intelligence, for the special duty of administering justice, that they are fairly paid, and not subject to capricious removal. If your Highness will take that all these safeguards for the administration of justice are made m permanent as possible, your Highness will not only the approval of Her Majesty's Government, but you will establish a permanent claim to be regarded as a benefactor to your people and a bright example to other princes. It will give me great pleasure to recount all you have done to Sir George Clerk, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., my predecessor in this Government. In the arrangement which he made with you, and which I carried out as promised by him, the administration of justice in districts which had been long under direct British rule entrusted to your Highness. Sir George Clerk confided in your proved anxiety to govern well, and I shall be glad to give him this manner that his confidence me not misplaced.

deliver to your Highness the Insignia of the Order manded by the Viceroy; and I carnestly trust that your Highness may long be spared to enjoy this dignity, and the consciousness that you have ever deserved it by your habitual me for the people placed under your rule.

The Insignia Grant of Dignity, and Letter of Dispensation, then presented to His Highness. On this a salute of 11 Guns and fired from the Saluting Battery.

Thakore Scheb (through Minister) replied following effect:—

Your Excellency.-If it been in my power to render marked services to the State, I could understand that I had carned this reward; but circumstances have not allowed me to show in action the earnest loyalty I have always felt for the person and realm of Queen Victoria. I conclude therefore that your Excellency, who is acquainted with the feelings of the Chiefs of this Presidency, have represented in favourably to Majesty. I thank you carnestly for the confidence you have shown in me, I have brought my principal artizans with me to Bombay, and hope that on our return to Bhownaggar we may add some substantial public work to those already in existence as a mark of admiration of what we have seen here. I know, however, that it is by the encouragement of education, and by my administration of justice, that I must hope to be remembered as an enlightened ruler. I will, therefore, encourage the schools which have been already founded in my territory, and will continue to assist the young man from them who come this capital to complete their education. Within the last few years written laws have been framed and promulgated throughout my estates, and heep my people acquainted with all necessary changes and improvements in them I have established an official Gazette. I present to your Excellency copies of these publications as an earnest that Bhownaggar is progressing with the times, and that I am striving so to rule, that I may be worthy of knighthood and of the illustrious comrades with whom my is enrolled.

Excellency the Governor then presented to Roo Bahadur Parmanandas Purshotamdas, pensioned Dufterdar, a pair of shawls for his services as a member of the Guzerat Wattan Commission.

After this the Minister of Jonaghar presented a Khareeta from Highness the Nawab.

Excellency then gave Pansuparee to His Highness the Thakore Faheb of Bhownaggar, the Acting Political Secretary to the Prime Minister, Gaorishankar Oodeshankar, to Rao Bahadur Parmanandas Purshotamdas and the Jonaghar Minister, and the Amistant Secretary Mr. P. Byan, to the other Members of His Highness' suite.

The Proceedings being over, His Excellency rose up and led his Highness the Thakore Saheb to the top of the staircase, from which he was led to his carriage by the Chief Secretary and the Acting Political Secretary to Government, and the officers of His Excellency's Staff.

The Guard of Honour presented arms when His Highness the Thakore-Saheb left the Government House.

The Bombay Tegislative Council.

POONA, TUESDAY, JULY 1803.

His Excuratory Sir H. B. E. Frore, addressed the Council as follows:—

Canaramiai,

I have called you together this day, in accordance with the first of the rules for the conduct of business by this Council, and in pursuance of the adjournment from your last sitting on the of last March.

There is considerable amount of important business, which will be laid before you in the consolidation, for although but three Bills have hitherto been publication within the next few days. The of them provide for important additions to the general law, such are: Act for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors in the Mofussil,—a very important for consolidating and amending the law under which the Mofussil Police acts—one for the amendment of Prison Discipline,—and to provide for the man of Minors' property to which I trust the attention of our Native Colleagues will be particularly directed, with a view to make it as complete and useful and as possible.

There also two Bills for extending in jurisdiction of the Cause Courts in Bombay and Karachi; and I observe, with special pleasure, that the Bombay Bill has been taken in hand by one of the additional Memberst of the Council, whose thorough knowledge of the subject is an excellent guarantee for the production of a useful and practical measure. There is also a Bill for bringing Sattara and Canara and other districts under the same laws which apply to the Bombay Presidency.

There was three Bills of a Municipal character......

- I. To give to the Bevenue Commissioners powers now vested in Government.
- 2. For the better regulation of the Vehar Water Works in Bombay, and,
- 8. To legalize a for local Public Works and Education in Sind.

There is also a manner similar to that which has been lately enacted in Bengal, to promote the formation of Roads and Railway Feeders.

There are two Bills of considerable interest to internal merce,—one relating to Port Dues in Canara, another to the Registry of River Boats and levy of Pilot Fees — the Indus.

There is also a very important relating to the Bank of Bombay, but our proceeding with it must depend upon the instructions receive from Her Majesty's Secretary of State and Government of India.

One of the most important which will be submitted that, to give legal effect to the settlement of Enam Lands which occupied so much of the attention of the late Governor, and which will, I believe, have a most beneficial effect in defining and securing rights in lands held free or partially free of Land Tax.

I also hope to bring in to carry out in this Presidency the Resolution, of the Governor General in Council dated 17th October 1861, relative to the Sale of Waste Lands, and to the Redemption of Land Tax.

Under Section of the Indian Councils' Act of 1861,* this measure must be submitted for the previous sanction of the Governor General, but I trust such sanction may be received in to admit of the being introduced this Session.

It would not have needed any reference to this Resolution,* one of the latest, in my humble opinion, one of the most useful of Lord Canning's measures, to remind — of the great loss — have sustained in the death of the late Viceroy.

I do not now speak of the great national loss, which will be most deeply felt by those who had the honour of being associated with him in the work of administration during his tenure of office in this country.

We have a special loss of our own, and we could not meet together here this day as the Council of the Governor of Bombay assembled for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations, without feeling acutely the loss of him who restored to this presidency the power of making its own local Laws and Regulations, and gave to us, the trained servants of Government, the inestimable advantage of publicly deliberating, and matters of legislation with men chosen from among the best and wisest of the non-official subjects of Her Majesty.

^{*} The Homeward Mail of the 25th, November 15th says of this Resolution in the following terms:—

[&]quot;Lord Canners's late Resolution on the sale of Waste Lands and the redemption Land-tax has been halfed on all sides we an immense boon, and we already placed him, in the estimation of all India, high in the List of sub-lest and most popular Viceroys. We may here say that the terms in which it is expressed we regarded to by Lord Canners's bitturest opponents we unexceptionable and statesmanlike."

[†] In transmitting this Act for the better constitution of the Council III the Gamma General of India, to Lord Canning, Sir C. Wood, the then Principal Secretary of State for India in his deepatch No 14 dated 9th August 1861 remarked thus:—

[&]quot;The Imperial Legislature has by this Act provided for the first time for the admission of Europeans independent of the Government, and of Natives of the part in the important work of legislating for India. I have no doubt this measure will be halled with satisfaction throughout the country. I entertain as little doubt that your Lordship will be able to fill up those appointments with persons in every way qualified to give the Government important and valuable assistance in matters that may make before it and I anticipate that the introduction of intelligent native Gentlemen into the Council will bring to its deliberations a knowledge of the wishes and feelings of the Native population, which cannot fail to improve the laws passed by the Council by adapting them to the wants the great may of the population of India."

The time has not yet when full justice can be done to Lord Canning's matter, partly because have yet to realize the greatness of the change which he effected.

These Councils, of which ours is one, are yet _ their trial.

I cannot do better than recall to your memory what was well said by my predecessor in this Government when he first opened this Council, and beg you to bear in mind what we then stated by one we able, and so experienced, and so sincerely anxious for the best interests of India, as Sir George Clerk.

It is only by a patient and conscientious discharge of our duty continued throughout a long series of years, that makes hope to win general confidence, and establish our character as an important and useful branch of the administration of this vast Empire.

We must be equally on sugard against neglecting any portion of the wide range of duty entrusted to us, and against the still more dangerous temptation of over-legislation or of overstepping the limits of our powers which have been marked out for us by the Imperial Parliament or by the Governor General or Secretary of State.

I, for one, have no misgiving as to the result. Even in the most restricted sense, the local affairs of m many millions of our fellow-subjects are matters of real and imperial interest oven in

"I shall be glad to find that influential Native Gentlemen from distant places have, even at many personal inconvenience in themselves, responded to the call in the head of the Government to take their places in the Council when legislating for the peace and good government of their country."

"It only remains for me, in conclusion, to express the great gratification I feel being permitted to avail myself of your Lordship's assistance in giving effect, before you quit India, to the intentions of Imperial Legislature. I look with great confidence I the advantage which will be derived from the commencement of the new system under your Lordship's directions. Your Lordship's experience in India, and the attention which you have given to this most important subject, render your Lordship must eminently to give effect to the measures introduced by Act for the tiovernment and Legislation of India; and the successful accomplishment of this may, he the last, though it will not be the least, of the services which you will have rendered to your Sovereign in that country."

wast Empire that of England, and when consider how much wealth, intelligence, and energy to be found in the population of this Presidency, what vast forces, material as well as moral and intellectual, are work in it either for good or evil, to the future of England as well of India, I cannot but think that the duty of legislating for such a country to the extent entrusted to us is one weighty enough to satisfy the most ardent aspirant who ever hoped to mould the future definites of his race.

Such is the importance of the duty, that I trust we shall fail to obtain the aid of those best qualified to assist us, among the community which is not otherwise directly connected with the Government of the Country.

But whatever the result, whether succeed one in establishing our character as a useful and indispensable portion of the machinery of Indian administration, History will tell that to Lord Canning belongs the honor of securing for the experiment the great elements, without which, I believe, success would be impossible.

While still engaged in extinguishing the last embers of the flery ordeal through which India had passed in 1857-58, he had recognized the great defects of the former legislative machinery. Its excessive centralization, its exclusive composition, comprising as it did more but official servants of Government, and the abof those who could speak personally as to the wants and wishes of the native community. He had proposed a measure in which all those defects supplied, and in all the discussions which followed he never swerved from the great principles he then laid down, and, if my rise to the occasion before us, it is to him that we owe the opportunity, for it he who secured to us the power for localized legislation all subjects of local interest, the admission to the legislative body of non-official members, and among them of those who can best advise us me to the opinions and wants of mative fellow-subjects; above to him m owe that publicity of proceedings, without which I believe all our other advantages would have been thrown away.

I will only further express a hope that ____ deliberations ____ be directed to a result equal to the opportunities we have at our disposal for promoting the happiness and welfare of this Presidency and the honor of Her Majesty's Government in India.

The Bombay Acgistative

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, in adjourning the Council said:—

He sale glad to find that the state of business before the Council was such that he was able to release them from further attendance by adjourning the Session.

The number of Bills passed during the Session on not more than six, but the of them were valuable and important especially the Bill for enlarging the jurisdiction of the Bombay Court of Small Causes* which had been passed at that Meeting.

Other most important had been advanced me far as time would allow, and were now awaiting the period fixed for the next stage of proceeding before they could be finally disposed of.

To some of them the Committees had devoted a great deal of time, trouble, and attention, sitting daily, cometimes for many hours a day. The best thanks of Government due on this account to their Colleagues, of whom had attended to the business before the Council at great sacrifice of their valuable time and leisure. One only been withdrawn, i. e., that relating to the Abolition of the Office of Law Officer of the Zillah Courts in the Mofussil, wit seemed likely that the object might be attained without water to legislation.

At the opening of the present Session he (the PRESIDENT) expressed a hope that during its course he might be able to bring in a Bill to give legal effect to the Resolution of the Government of India, dated the 17th October 1961, on the subject of the Sale of Waste Lands and the Redemption of Land Tax.

He was not at that time aware of the which Her Majesty's Government proposed to follow with regard that Resolution, and he spoke with reference mainly to the duty imposed to the local Governments by the last paragraph of the Resolution, in preparing the Drafts of such laws might be needed to give legal effect to the provisions of the Resolution so as to secure for all grantees under the Resolution Legislative title to their property.

He (the PRESIDENT) had carefully read everything which been published in the shape of criticism of the Resolution, and confess that nothing he had read or heard had in any way altered the opinion he then expressed of the provisions of the Resolution, induced him to doubt the justice and sound policy of its provisions.

It is true that many for whose opinions on such subjects, he (the PRESIDENT) had the highest respect did not agree with him; but he felt confident in the soundness of the principles which the Resolution is founded, that he would be well content to trust to time and discussion, assured that any of who may be living 10 years hence will find very general agreement to the wisdom and justice if not the necessity of the main provisions of the Resolution.

But whatever may be our individual opinions, we have in the mean time received very detailed and definite instructions from Her Majesty's Government on to the mount to be pursued in dealing with Waste Lands and the Land Tax. The directed in the Secretary of State's despatch of the 9th of July 1862, which has been published in the Calcutta Government Gazette, do not go of far as the Resolution of the 17th October 1861, but there be doubt they will prove of very great value to interests connected with the land which is liable to Government assessment; and if carried out in the print in which they are conceived, will do much to remove present uncertainties of tenure and assessment, and to afford to labour and capital devoted to the improvement of land great security against over-taxation of such improvements.

It will be the carnest desire of the Bombay Government to secure these benefits to all interested in the land, but the necessary will differ materially from those he (the PRESIDENT) contemplated when previously alluding to this subject, and not possibly be introduced this Session.

It might perhaps, be found necessary to have an extra Session before the usual period, say, in October, but he hoped not.

[The President's Address.]

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE, addressed the Council stating that in consequence of a Despatch from the Secretary of State to the Government of India, and communicated by the latter to this Government, certain changes would have to be made in the Rules under which the business of the Council had hitherto been conducted. Those changes would not materially affect the practice of the Council in its legislative capacity, but it and desirable that the wishes of the Home Government and of the Government of India should be conformed to, and the Rules of this Council assimilated to those of the other Presidencies. The Despatch would therefore be printed and circulated to the Honorable

Of the Bills passed up to the date of the last adjournment of the Council and forwarded for assent to the Governor General, two, he (the President) remarked, had been rejected on grounds of principle. These were the Juvenile Reformatories Bill, and the Karachi Small Cause Court Bill. Amended Bills would be presented by the Honorable Mr. Frere and the Honorable Mr. Inversity respectively.

It important that the for bringing certain Districts and Villages under the Regulations of the Bombay Presidency should be passed before the end of the year. That Bill would therefore be brought forward at a carly day for the second reading.

The Railway Feeders Bill* aimed at objects similar to those intended to be attained by a general ensemble now under the consideration of the Government of India. In the absence of the Honorable Mr. Scott who had charge of the Bill, Itis Excellency could not say precisely what his views on the subject might be, but it would probably be advisable to compare the provisions of the two measures, and to suggest to the Government of India the adoption of any amendments of their own intended measure, which might be suggested by the proposed by this Government.

The Bills for the settlement of Claims to Inams, and for regulating Pilotage Pees on the Indus, awaited the consideration of the Reports of the Select Committees which had already been presented. The four Bills for regulating the Police Administration of this Presidency had been referred to a Select Committee, whose reports when to be presented at the present Meeting of the Council. The Report of the Select Committee appointed to consider the to americal Act XVIII. of 1862, when to enable the Judges of the High Court and Magistrates to commit convicted prisoners to the County Jail as well as to the House of Correction, was also to be presented, and delay need be anticipated in passing

The Second Inam Bill for regulating the disposal of claims to Exemptions from Laud Revenue in those parts of the Presidency which are not subject to the operation of Act XI of 1852,† under the charge of the Honorable Mr. Robertson. The Report of the Select Committee would be presented, and the Bill might be a once carried through its final stage.

Amongst the measures to be brought forward, he might mention and on the subject of the Vehar Water Works, the charge of which had been undertaken by the Honorable Mr. Robertson. An Insolvency Bill for the Mofuscil was also in preparation, and would shortly be introduced by the Honorable Mr. Frere. This originated in the discovery, that the rules upon which Insolvency Jurisdiction had for wears been exercised in Sind, rested on a doubtful legal basis. Il was therefore necessary that indemnity should be given for all acts done under them, and that they should be continued temporarily, pending the enactment of more general measure. It might be considered that legislation this subject belonged properly to the Government of India than to local Governments, but it would, in any case, be desirable to extend to the other parts of this Presidency the benefit which Sind had hitherto exceptionally enjoyed; and if the Government of India should eventually determine itself to take up the subject, the self of this Government might probably be adopted as the basis of the general enactment.

The want of m Act for the regulation of Hired Conveyances in the Island of Bombay had been seriously felt. A Bill providing

[The Bombay Burial Bill.]

His EXCELLENCY SIE H. B. E. FREEE said that it appeared to him that the scope of the was considerably larger than the evil to be remedied, at least than the evil proved to exist. The remains of the dead disposed of in Bombay according to almost every method known in the world, the most harmless, as well as the most injurious; and the speared to include them without discrimination. The Europeans who would be affected by the provisions of the Bill would recognize its advantages, if they shown the necessity of the measure, and the second for carry-

This Bill withdrawn by its Mover, Hon. Mr. Tristram. On the 18th 1863, the Bombay Government appointed a Commission Ruropean Mative gentlemen for the purpose of associating practice to the various communities in Bombay, of inquiring whether any to the public health arose from such practice, and of devising, if such detriment existed, by what the evil would, with the greatest efficacy, and with the inconvenience of classes, be diminished, and if pensible, removed.

The Commission — October — submitted — elaborate report to Government, and its several suggestions were embodied in the new Bombay Municipal Act. Vide Sec. — 209 of Bombay Act — of 1865. The — Section gives — Municipal Commissioner ample powers to make bye-laws for the inspection and regulation — burial as burning grounds, and to prescribe rules as to — depth of graves and places of interment, and generally as to all matters connected with the good order of burial and burning grounds, and places for — exposure of the dead, due regard being had to the religious unages of the several classes of — Community.

ing it out. The Honorable member (Mr. W. B. Tristram) would probably succeed better if he would for the present confine himself to providing for those classes who would hall his intervention. No one, he thought, could have attended an ordinary European burial in Bombay, without being struck with the utter want of solemnity and almost decency of the provision made for a resting place for our dead. If the Honorable member therefore, would consent to limit his Bill to the prevention only of such burials in the Town of Bombay, he would probably gain as much support - he must now expect opposition. As regards the Mahomedans, their law laid down minute regulations as to the conduct of burials, such as the depth of the grave, &c., which could not men be properly complied with. Many Mahomedans therefore would accept with much thankfulness the provision of a botter burial place than they at present possessed. Considering the remarks of the Honorable members who had given attention to the subject, it might be advisable for the Honorable member to postpone the measure until it could be put into shape in which practical effect could at be given to it. Should be press it in its present shape, it would probably be modified in Committee as to deprive it of important provisions. He (the President) wished to add before the Honorable Mr. Tristram replied to the remarks of the Council. that if the Honorable member would consent to withdraw the measure for the present, he (the President) should be prepared to promise on behalf of Government, that . Commission should be appointed to examine and report upon the whole subject.

[The Cotton Fraude Bill; First Reading.*]

HIS EXCRLLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE said that he would state what the general views of the Bombay Government on this subject. It was their desire to promote the ends of the Bill as far as was possible without the introduction of other evils. The preservation of the staple of this Presidency from adulteration an object of the highest importance, and one which interested in its welfare, could overlook. It we evident from all that had been said that there was a general of opinion as to the almost universal practice of adulteration and the necessity of suppressing it by fresh legislation. The Bill proceeded on that principle; and as it was necessary at present, to discuss no more than the principle, no obstacle he thought should be thrown in the way of the first reading. As to the details of the measure it was probable that considerable alterations would be necessary. All Acts containing penal clauses must henceforth be regarded with reference to the Penal Code: comprehensive enactment which me intended to embody all the received principles of criminal jurisprudence = applied to the circumstances of India. enact any thing in opposition to that Code beyond the competence of the Conneil; and whatever was further proposed in the way of penal legislation should appear as a development of the principles of the Code or at most supplement to its provisious. If therefore, as he thought was probable, some portions of the proposed manuse should be found to be inconsistent with the provisions of the Code, an alteration me these points would be absolutely necessary. The object of the before the Council, we want make him who wilfully deteriorated Cotton, - caused it to - a appearance, subject to severe penalties. Il was a some difficulty to determine how these objects to be attained with the least possible interference with the free _____ of trade, but he had little doubt that by the aid of the experience and ability which would be brought to bear on the subject, the difficulty might be overcome. If this so, an efficient law for the prevention of adulteration, would promote the interest alike of the honest dealer and of the rvot. Without some such measure, he feared that India's opportunity might not only pass away without improvement, but me result would be to ruin the repute of Indian Cotton in the market of the world and in the estimation of manufacturers. Such ■ Bill he thought must be framed as would do for Indian Cotton what had been done for American Cotton, that merchants might safely deal in the article without fear of taking in their European customers. Accepting this general principle, he thought that in sending the Bill to . Select Committee, the members of the Committee ought not to be tied down by conditions - the Ronorable mover of the Bill had felt himself bound by the opinions of his fellow-Commissioners who sided him to draw up the Bill. The object of the Committee should be so to amend the Bill, where necessary, that it might be likely - once to meet the approval of authorites at a distance, and to answer the important purpose which all agreed in desiring to attain.

[The Cotton Franda Bill.]

EXCELLENCY SIE H. B. E. FREER said:—Before discussing the Clauses of this Bill, it is as well to remind the Council that have before in point of fact four Bills, besides great number of miscellaneous amendments. We have the original Bill which, if I am not mistaken, and of the members still prefer to the Bill mamended by the Select Committee. We have that amended the the general tendency of its amendments being to throw less responsibility upon the second of presses. We have Mr. Robertson's amendments which amount in fact to a fresh Bill, the ruling idea of which seems to be to devolve those who have to work the Bill, that is, Government, the task of seeing that no bad cotton to market, and greatly to increase the responsibility of pressowners; and finally, have Mr. Premabhai Hemabhai's amendments, which also amount in fact to a Bill, in which in the stringent portions of the original momitted.

I will not anticipate the discussion on the Bill, I would only beg Honorable members to bear in mind the general tendency of the several forms in which the Bill is presented: whether in the interest of the Bombay merchant, the Bombay press-owners, of the up-country merchant, or of the cotton growing ryot, and to avoid as far possible that appearance of a patch-work measure which the Bill will mulless the ruling idea of the several amendments be constantly borne in mind.

I would further beg the Council to remember that neither form of the Bill in in any way claim the character of a Government measure. I in the desirous to impress this upon the Council, because I see that the Honorable Mr. Robertson's amendments sometimes spoken of in "the Government measure," and without in any respect pronouncing an opinion in those amendments, I wish it to be clearly understood, and I is sure the Honorable member himself would wish them to be understood, in not entitled to or claiming to be considered as a Government

It is not that the Government would shrink from the responsibility of any which their duty required them to introduce, but I am that those members of the Council who best sequainted with mercantile affairs would object, and I think justly, to the Government taking upon itself to draw and carry through the Council any so materially affecting the commercial and agricultural interests of the Presidency, without having good cause to believe that they carried with them the general consent and approval of those who, from their profession, best qualified to judge of what really best for the interests of fair trade and honest agriculture.

It is only necessary to glance through the papers before us to how widely different are the views of the most experienced and those who has most deeply interested in the question.

There are certain fundamental rules which are generally recognized by the British Parliament and people in dealing with questions of this kind, and among the most clearly defined of those rules is that which prohibits further interference with the natural course of trade than ___ be proved to be necessary for the safety of the public, of the fair trader, and of those who cannot protect themselves. Government believed, and still believe, that a clear case had been made out for Legislative interference, but how far that interference is necessary and allowable proves to be a question of greater difficulty, and regarding which greater diversity of opinion exists than at first supposed. It is clear that devise can have any chance of unless the grounds of its necessity are very fully established, and the justice of its several provisions placed beyond all reasonable doubt. We have not only to carry with those whose confirmation is necessary to make the Bill law, but me have to avoid making a stringent that it may defeat itself by the general inconvenience to trade occasioned by working it.

Under such circumstances it seems to me that it would be peculiarly undesirable to support any measure as a Government measure beyond the point to which the experience of the individual Government members, and the reasons they may be able to aduce shall entitle those opinions to the general support of the Council.

It appears to the duty of Government to aid the Honorable member (Mr. M. H. Scott,) who has so zealously devoted much time and ability to this important measure, to obtain all information procurable and throw every possible light — the subject. This I think has been very fully done. It is a further duty to consider all the information and the conflicting opinions submitted with the aid of such light as our official experience may furnish, and to do our best to assist the Council to produce — useful workable — ; this I hope — shall do to-day, and when the Council have come to their decision and the measure has become law, it will be the duty of Government — see that it is executed as far its execution may, by law, rest with the Executive Officers of Government. This I venture to promise shall be done. I will now proceed to put the Clauses scriatim.

In doing this he begged to thank the non-official members for the zeal and energy with which they had performed their legislative duties in this, me well as in the preceding Sessions. It would be to the Honorable members, as it must be himself, a must of regret that this must probably the last occasion on which the Honorable Mr. Tristram would ait as their colleague. He hoped that that Honorable gentleman would carry with him to Europe some portion of the interest which he had manifested me resident of this Presidency in the welfare of Bombay. He had only to add that the interest and knowledge of business displayed by the non-official members of the Council in disposing of the various subjects which had members of the legislature in

[The President's Address.]

HIS EXCELLENCY SIE H. B. E. FRENE informed the Council that the list of Bills which set down for discussion during their present sitting to not a long one, but it comprised some measures of very great importance.

The Bill for regulating proceedings in some of Insolvency was a measure of the greatest importance, and would, he hoped, prove a very valuable addition to the Statute Book.

It would require careful consideration to determine how far it would require of this Council to pass the stood, whether it would be requisite to invoke the authority of the Council of the Governor General. But in either was it would be desirable to put the measure into as perfect a shape as possible with reference to the requirements of this Presidency.

He hoped also that Government would be able to lay before the Council a Bill to give legal effect to the provisions of the Revenue Survey Bules, and to define the rights and liabilities of all parties connected with the land which had been subject to the Survey and Assessment.* This was a which it was the wish of the late lamented Mr. H. E. Goldsmid and Major

But where many interests were affected, it most desirable that all parties concerned should have the fullest notice of the details of the measure, and ample opportunity for discussing them, and therefore, though he (the President) hoped the measure would be very shortly laid before the Council, its final passing would probably be deferred till the Council met in Bembay.

The principal other which were in state to be laid before the Council were—

- 1. A Bill for the periodical Survey of Steam Vessels. [Now Act II of 1864.]
- 2. A Bill to repeal the Regulation which makes it necessary that a Sub-Collector should also be ex-officio Joint Magistrate of the District. [Now Act III of 1864.]

There was a few other measures of minor importance which might probably be laid before the Council during their present sitting. But they was not at present in a shape which rendered their early submission to the Council matter of certainty.

Besides the Bills there is one subject of considerable importance, which will engage the attention of the Council, and that is, the revision of the Standing Rules for the transaction of business in the Council. It is the desire of Her Majesty's Secretary of State that these Rules should, and far as practicable, be assimilated throughout the three presidencies. This has been done by the Madras and Bengal Councils, and it is desirable that the subject should mem engage the attention of this Council.

[The Wagers' Bill.*]

His Excellency Sie H. B. E. By sending Bill for previous sanction after it had been amended in Council, those evils would be avoided that had been dwelt on by the Honorable Mr. Westropp, and he did not think that the independence of this Council would in any way be compromised by submitting for sanction when in this state. The object of sending - Bill containing - penal clause for sanction not to ascertain the will of the Viceroy in regard to the principle of the Bill, but to let the Government of India know that local Council - engaged in penal legislation, so - to enable the Notwithstanding the vehement opposition of IIII Excellency Bir W. Manufield, the Hou'ble Mesers W. E. Frere and Walter Cassels III this Bill, it was passed by the Bombay Council on the 3rd September 1864, and has been published as Bombay Act III of 1865.

Supreme Government to check such legislation in it provided anything that was not consistent with the principle of the Indian Penal Code, It me never supposed that the Penal Code many other of the new Codes was perfect or final; but it would be very objectionable if modifications of these Codes were made in the neveral local Councils independently of the guidance of the Supreme Government. The Codes were intended to be comprehensive and generally applicable, and it meces-ary that in all extensions alterations of the Codes, uniformity should, as far possible, be preserved whenever it was found necessary to resort to special penal legislation in any of the the local Councils. The duty of maintaining this uniformity devolved, by Law, as the Secretary of State observed, upon His Excellency the Governor General in Council. He thought therefore that the present Bill might be submitted at its present stage for the criticism of the Governor General in Council without the danger of establishing a precedent prejudicial to the independence of this Council.

In taking the Bill into consideration Clause by Clause, Honorable members would be quite unfettered, not only as to the number of times they might speak on any given point, but also me to the subject of their remarks; me that there was nothing to prevent any amount of discussion on the principle of the Bill. [The Wagers' Bill.]

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE said that it had not originally been his intention to take part in the debate on His Excellency Sir William Mansfield's motion; but he thought he should now do good service to the Council if he recalled to their recollection the exact position in which they stood in regard to Mr. Westropp's Bill. In the first place he must remind them that the Bill was not . Government Bill. It was introduced by their late colleague, Mr. Westropp, which his experience at the Bar showed me necessary to enable the Courts of Justice to carry out the existing law. It had been doubted during the course of the debate whether the Chief Justice was in favour of the proposed Bill - not. He (the President) had good reason to believe that the Chief Justice (Sir Matthew Sausse) considered the subject of the Bill to be one which called for the careful attention of the Legislature; they had before them proof that the other Judges on the Original side of the High Court held similar views. While on this point, he (the President) must remark with reference to what had fallen from the Honorable members who opposed the Bill, that in taking this view the Honorable Judges could have no other object than to prevent the time of Courts of Justice being taken up in deciding the disputes of gamblers. It also patent to the Council that several of the more influential members of the mercantile community, including four members of that Council, in favour of some legislation the subject, though they not agreed as to the form which such legislation should take. There could then be no doubt that the subject before them, recommended to their consideration by the highest judicial and mercantile authorities in the country. Whether the Bill before them was such as the exigencies of the required of course quite a different question. In Excellency Sir William Mansfield apparently denied the gambling character of time-bargains, still he (the President) thought there could be little doubt that the practice of entering into time-bargains and gambling practice and not legitimate trading.

There could be - doubt from all that they had heard that Act XXI. of 1848 had been evaded. It had been objected to Mr. Westropp's Bill that while it purported to carry out Act XXI., it nowhere defined what a wagering contract But courts of law rarely found any practical difficulty in deciding what gambling transaction and what legitimate trading. There was always this broad distinction between them, that whereas gambling transactions always excluded main far as possible all exercise of judgment or skill wable to control the event-it we the object of legitimate trading to obviate as far as possible the operation of mere chance, and to make the event of the transaction depend on the skilland judgment of the trader. Of course doubtful might arise, but there was this broad practical difference which it very difficult to recognize, and there could be fear that such Bill as was before them would interfere with legitimater trade. As to the ____ dwelt on by His Excellency the Commandor-in-Chief in the notes he had read them of his conversation with a native gentleman.* it sufficient to say the transactions described not time-bargains and none of them could be in any way affected by this Bill. Then again it had been said that the Bill was opposed to the spirit of modern legislation. Now, after all that they heard today and me former occasions, he could not conin this objection. If the lad enacted pains and penalties against gambling, it would perhaps have been opposed to the spirit of modern legislation, but a carefully avoided the enactment of penalties. It said to the time-bargainers behalf of the courts of law "we do not interfere with your bets wour bargains; but do not occupy our time in enforcing what _____ to the court to be immoral transactions."

This ___ the principle of the ___ as it affected the courts of law.

[&]quot; Ráo Bahadur Shumbhaparead Lakshumilal, of the Guzerat Revenue Survey,

It mistake therefore to say that the Bill of the character in the usury and sumptuary laws. But though he approved of the principle of the Bill, he thought that His Excellency Sir William Mansfield had shown very satisfactorily that the information they possessed was not sufficient to justify legislation the present moment. If the had been a Government measure, he (the President) would certainly have asked for more evidence in regard to it before sanctioning its introduction into the Council. And he would now put it to His Excellency Sir William Mansfield, whether it would not be better to adjourn the discussion until more evidence could be adduced, rather than shelve the Bill for the present, at least by moving the amendment in the form in which His Excellency had moved it.

[The President's Address.]

His Excellence Sir H. B. E. Frene informed the Council that he found that there were sixteen projects of law which would probably engage their attention during their present sittings. These had been transferred from the different Departments of the Government to the Legislative Department. Some of them had already been under the consideration of the Council, and these would possibly become law, with little or alteration, in their present form. Others again had been published in the official Gazette and their provisions, though perhaps already known to the public, had not been under discussion at meeting of the Council for naking Laws and Regulations. Under the present rules, these neasures must be held having been introduced into the Council, and he trusted that they would meet with the consideration which

In disposing of the Orders of the day, he proposed to give precedence to the consideration of the report of the Select Committee on the Rules for regulating the conduct of business at meetings of the Council. The Rules proposed by the Committee involved some material amendments in the practice hitherto in force in disposing of the business that came before them, and it very desirable that the amended rules should be adopted as soon as possible, in order that all legislative measures that might engage their attention during their present sittings might be disposed of in accordance with the procedure.

Among the first and most important Bills that would before them was the Bill for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, and for amonding certain points in the Law of Debtor and Creditor. A Select Committee had reported this Bill on the 6th of April last, and in accordance with the suggestions of the Committee the measure had been submitted to the Government of India with reference to certain Clauses in it, in regard to which it mecessary, under Section of the Indian Councils' Act, to obtain the minute of His Excellency the Viceroy before proceeding with the further consideration of the Bill.*

The Honorable Mr. FREEE had also two other very important in his charge, of which had already been published in the Government Gazette, and the other he believed in the Press. The Bill to assimilate the jurisdiction of Principal Sudder, Ameens, Sudder Ameens, and Moonsiffs to that exercised by Officers of like denomination in other parts of India, was one that would very closely affect the interests of a classes of the Native community, and were inregard to which he hoped the Native Members of the Council would state freely what modifications would, n their opinion, be required in the introduced. The Bill or the regulation of Jails and the enforcement of discipline therein, would give legal effect to many improvements that had lately been made in the management of our Jails. It would consolidate the several laws relating to the subject that scattered throughout the Statute Book, and it would extend to places to which the old laws not applicable. The jurisdiction of the Inspector General of Prisons had been extended to the Jails in Sind and Aden, and it were desirable that the system of Jail management in all parts of his jurisdiction should, be subject to law. The Bill that would be brought before the Council would, if passed, nsure this end, and one provision in would enable the Government to relieve the Session Judges of the charge of Jails,-a duty which the Session Judges found which, with the increase of work thrown on them since the Codes of Civil and Criminal Procedure into operation, they could not perform with satisfaction either to themselves - to the public.

The Government hoped also to lay before the Council Bill for the better demarcation and management of the Government Forests in the Presidency of Bombay†; and also a Bill to provide for the survey, demarcation, assessment, and subsequent management f lands held under Government in the Districts belonging to the Bombay Presidency, and for the registration of the rights and incrests of the occupants of the

^{*} The Bombay Legislative Council did not proceed with this Bill, but a saving the solicit subsequently introduced by the Hon'ble Mr. M. J. thaw Stewart, into the Governor General's Council and passed, and has been sublished as Act No. XIV of 1869.

This last measure was second in importance to none that would engage their attention. Much labour had been bestowed it by Government, and it had been drawn in its present form after the most careful consideration by its framer, the Honorable Mr. J. D. Inverarity. He trusted that the Council would give the their best attention when it came before them.

He would only notice two more of the Bills that would he hoped, be passed at their present sittings. Both of them were only of a formal character; but it am still very necessary that they should be passed. The first of these related to the Bombay Municipality. The Council were aware that the administration of Municipal affairs in Bombay, under the present system, gave very little satisfaction to the people of Bombay. The Government intended to bring forward, at an early date, a general measure to amend the present Municipal Act (No. XXV. of 1858). Some time however must clapse before the general measure could become law. In the meantime an election of Municipal Commissioners would, under the provisions of the present law, be made in August next, and these Commissioners would, under this law, remain in office for three years. It was obvious that much public inconvenience might be occasioned if steps were not taken to reduce the period for which these Commissioners were to remain in office; and a Bill would be accordingly brought in to enable the Governor in Council to declare for what period the Commissioners to be elected under the present law man to remain in office. It ment proposed that the Government should declare that this period mes to exceed one year. The other measure he had referred to was a Bill to enable the Government to spend the surplus balance of the Fee Fund of the Small Cause Court in Bombay in erecting a Court House. The balance had accumulated - the 30th April last to nearly 22 lakes of Rupees, and it was, as they all knew, a very important matter that a suitable Court House should be provided. A house very much required, and the Bill would have been introduced at once had it not been found that the collections account of the Fee Fund had been credited in the public accounts to the head of " Imperial Revenues." This mode of dealing with the fees was not authorized by the law, as, under the Small Cause Court Act, the fees ought to have been credited to the General Fund of the Court, and he might state, on the authority of the late Advocate General of Calcutta, (Mr. William Ritchie,) that a legal enactment even would not ordinarily have been necessary to enable the Government to appropriate the balance of the fund towards the erection of a new Court House, provided the work number-taken with the consent of the Judges. But as the fees had actually been credited to Imperial Revenues, any interference with them now, for the purposes of the proposed Act, might be held to affect the public debt of India, and the previous sanction of His Excellency the Viceroy would therefore be required to the Council's taking the measure into consideration. This sanction would, he trusted, be obtained in time to enable them to pass the proposed. Bill at their present sittings.

His Exceptency Sir H. B. E. Frere said he would briefly state his view of the Bill in anticipation of the very probable event of his having to give a casting vote on the question of the second reading.

He must briefly trace the history of the Bill and would first remind the Council that the Bill was not a Government It before the Council as a drawn up by the Acting Advocate General, (the Hon'ble Mr. Westropp) at the instance of the Chief Justice of the High Court, and with the declared sole object of preventing the waste of the valuable time of that Court, and the loss of dignity and self-respect, which, the Council assured, were now occasioned to the Court by its having to entertain and decide selass of suits which in England the Courts of Law seem allowed to decline deciding.

In England, they were told, such suits used formerly to be entertained in Courts of Law, and the Judges sum forced to decide them. It was, however, repugnant to the feelings of such English Judge to be forced to devote the time of his Court in applying the principles of pure law to the adjudication of disputes arising out of gambling transactions, which were often obviously immoral and dishonest. This repugnance formed strong temptation to Judge find sums for evading his legal duty in the adjudication of such cases, and the temptation strong in proportion to the Judge's respect for his high office, and for the honour and character of his Court.

The strong remarks they had heard quoted from a Judgment of an eminent English Chief Justice (Lord John Campbell,) were, he believed, directed against Judges who had given way to this feeling so far as to evade, insufficient grounds, the disagreeable task of deciding which had their origin in gambling transactions.

He (the President) need not tell them that it as a serious dereliction of judicial duty to give way to any such feeling from any motives however high and pure, and the strong remarks of the Chief Justice were no doubt called for. But, to assume all temptation to such a course, the English Parliament altered the law, and allowed the Courts in England to decline to decide such suits a soon at they are clearly shown to have their origin in gambling transactions.

In India, the course of legislation had been very similar up to a certain point, and, for the same reasons, Act XXI. of 1848 passed. That Act is declared to have been effectual as far as it wunt, but it only applied to principals, and after is years the gambling traders found out they could evade it by acting through agents. The Bill now before them had for its declared object to extend the former Act, and to enable the Courts to deal with wagers conducted through agents in the same way as if they been conducted by the principals, i. e. to throw them out is Court, and leave the parties to decide them among themselves, without occupying the time of Courts of Law.

Now, is the objection of the Judges having their time occupied by such suits a frivolous or trifling one? It am not held to be a by the English Judges and English Parliament and if he (the President) might without disrespect to the Bench express opinion as such a point, he would say that, in the character of the Chief Justice of Bombay, they had the best guarantee that the Bill before them and not a piece of fanciful as superfluous legislation. Sir M. Sausse's character as a sound lawyer of the best school, and most painstaking and conscientious Judge, as so eminent, that when he said such a Bill are required for the character or even for the convenience of the High Court, he (the President) thought the Council bound to give the utmost attention to his suggestions.

So much for the history of the Now of what does the consist? It is obviously divisible into two parts. The first portion simply gives effect in the of wagering transactions managed through agents to the existing law to principals, and puts the Indian High Courts in this respect on the same footing as the Courts in England. Regarding the necessity for this portion of the Bill the Judges of the High Court were quite unanimous, and, looking to their opinions, he (the President) thought that the Bill deserved their most careful attention, and that very strong against this portion of it must be shown to justify their rejecting it.

Now, against this part of the second few of the arguments they had heard seemed to him (the President) to be sail applicable. The arguments might be very applicable to any Bill to discourage wagering to punish gambling. But there nothing of that kind in the first six clauses of the The Bill simply said—"Do what you please in the way of wagering gambling out of Court, but do not into Court to decide your bets; you by the existing law, do so principals; gambler such any locus in the Courts to be able to compel Court to adjudicate his gambling squabbles for him, and you shall not henceforth evade the existing law by bringing such cases into Court and compel — to decide them through agents." Against this he had heard nothing either that day or previously which seemed to him — effective argument.

But Clauses 7 and seemed to him (the President) not only to go far beyond the rest of the Bill, but to be in clear opposition to its principle, and he must therefore object to them, and his right to vote against them, if they were pressed, in considering the Bill in detail. He entirely agreed in the view taken of them by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice C. J. Erskine, whose remarks he commended to the careful consideration of the Council.

He would not detain them by examining in detail the objections made to the Bill on the ground that it was a protectionist measure—a measure meant to protect or foster trade. There was no one in the Council whose character or known opinions were a better guarantee against his having any thing to do with Bill which could be described than the Honorable Mr. Scott; but it seemed to him (the President) unnecessary to defend the Bill on this score to prove the entire consistency of the Honorable gentleman, for the Bill was, in its history and objects, obviously not meant to protect trade or morality, but simply to save the time of Courts of Justice, and prevent their being misused and perverted into instruments for deciding and enforcing mere wagers. It was a Lawyer's and a Judge's Bill—not a Merchant's Bill, and he felt mean such arguments the Chief Justice used in recommending the Bill would not be addressed to the Council m vain.

There was, however, one argument which had been urged by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief which demanded careful consideration. His Excellency maintained that the Bill ultra vires. He (the President) did not agree with much which had fallen from His Excellency on this point. As far the could judge, he did not think the Bill beyond the powers of that Council to enact. Nor, if it had been, did he think that the discussion of the question by that Council would be thrown away. He (the President) believed that, even if the subject had been reserved for the exclusive consideration of the Governor General's Council, such a discussion of the arguments for and against it, as they had heard from the advocates well as the opponents of the Bill, and such discriminating criticism as contained in the remarks of the Honorable Jagannath Sankarsett, would be considered most useful by the Council of the Governor General, and, such question, would be received with attention and respect, as expressing the views of those who practically knew the wants of the commercial metropolis of Western India.

But he thought it was quite possible that though the Bill within the powers of that Council we deal with, the Government of India might think the subject of such general importance as to deserve to be dealt with by the Council of the Governor General of India, and in this point of view he would suggest to the Honorable Mover the propriety, if the Bill passed second reading, of sending it to the Government of India to know if they were inclined to deal with it as separal measure in the Governor General's Council.

This would avoid all risk of its being disallowed like the Census Bill+; not because it was beyond the powers of that Council, but merely because it was considered expedient that any legislation on the subject should apply to all India.

POONA, SATURDAY 3rd. SEPTEMBER 1864.

The Wagers' Bill. ?

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE said that, Mr. Scott had raised the question of order, he thought it right to say that ^{*} Vide Proceedings of the Council dated 12th September 1863, Vol. II, page 80, and 20th August 1864, Vol. III, _____ 68.

⁺ Bombay Act XI of 1863. This Law and disablewed by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India. The census of the Town and Island of Bossbay has however taken on the 1st February 1864. It is contemplation to have a General Census whole of India in the year 1871.

the why had not before stopped the further discussion on the principle of the Bill, was, because he did not wish it to be supposed that he objected to the fullest and freest possible discussion present measure. Mr. Scott might fairly have objected the question of the principle of the having been again raised, and, considering the nature of the opposition that had been made to this Bill, he (the President) could not but admire the forbearance that had been exhibited by Mr. Scott in the present instance.

His Excellency Sir W. Mansfield had said that he had the opinion of the outside public with him. Mr. Scott had raised a demurrer to this statement, and he (the President) thought it important matter to prevent the idea gaining ground, that, in adopting this Bill, they were proceeding in any way contrary to an expressed public opinion. Mr. Scott had, m it appeared to him claimed the existence of a powerful opinion on his side of the question. For what we the state of the case? All the Judges of the High Court had approved of the Bill in the form in which Mr. Scott proposed its adoption; and sull half of the Chamber of Commerce had recorded minutes most strongly in favour of the principle of the Bill. No doubt much weight to be attached to the opinions expressed in the petitions which had been that day presented to the Council. But these opinions would have been entitled to much more weight if they had been expressed a year ago, than now, when the Bill had been so ably opposed in this Council m almost to invite opposition, and, with all respect to the merchants and well-known Barristers and Solicitors, and other persons who had signed this petition, it might safely be stated that if the principle of this Bill man right, these were the very persons from whom opposition was to be expected. Now what we the principle of this Bill? Was it Merchant's Bill? Certainly not. It as a

Two petitions against the Wagors' Bill presented that day [3rd September 1864' to the Council. One as signed by many wealthy, respectable Native Cotton Merchants of Bombay; such as, Jewrax Balloo, Narsee Kessowji Naique, Merwanji Nassarwanji Bhownaggri, Ardaseer Edalji Chenoy, Premchand Roychand and 150 others. The other was signed by influential European Merchants, Barristers, Solicitors, and 255 others, headed by Mesars. Campbell, Mitchell & Co., Finlay, Scott & Co., Killick, Nixon & Co.

Judge's Bill. It introduced into this Council with the conof the Chief Justice of Her Majesty's High Court by a gentleman who has since been elevated to the Beach of the High Court. When the Bill introduced, it most clearly stated by the Henerable Mr. Westropp that the object of the Bill to remedy a defect in Act XXI. of 1848. In practice, that Act had failed to secure the results which the Legislature had anticipated from its enactment. It had failed to keep wagering transactions out of the Courts, and the scandal of having to adjudicate in such transactions had been keenly felt by the Judges. The necessity for legislation, in amendment of the Act, was very apparent to the Bench, and Mr. Westropp's Bill admitted, an all hands, to secure most effectually the object he had in view in introducing it. When Mr. Westropp left this Council, he made over charge of the measure to Mr. Scott, who had carried it on solely with the object of giving effect to the view entertained of this measure by the Judges of the High Court. This fact, however, the petitioners entirely ignored. They failed, as it appeared to him, to limit themselves to a consideration of the exact scope of the Bill; they attached a much wider import to its provisions than allowable. They held it to embraco a class of transactions which they had the authority of Mr. Westropp and Mr. Scott for declaring were not included within the application of the No doubt the petitioners correctly stated that there was little difference between real and gambling transactions; but (he spoke and layman, and not lawyer, or m a person having authority in commercial matters) there was this patent fact, that the Courts of Justice had little practical difficulty in discriminating between the two classes of transactions. Of this there could be no doubt, that transactions which it me obviously the intention of the Legislature to consider as null and void had found admission into our Courts. This must be held to be an evil; and it was an evil which had attained an exceptional magnitude in the Bombay Presidency. The class of which had been improperly engaging the time of the Judges had so increased in number, that it had become, in the opinion of the Chief Justice, absolutely necessary to take steps to prevent their further accumulation. His Excellency Sir W. Manufield said that the effect of the would be to increase litigation. but this a matter which the prinions of the Judges the most worthy of attention. It manifest that the Bill had been misrepresented, and it was not difficult, therefore, to understand how the probable effects of the proposed law might be misapprehended by those who had not the opportunities of estimating its effects that possessed by the Judges of the High Court. To instance only one misapprehension, it had been represented that the Bill was opposed to the principles of free trade, that it would seriously cripple the Cotton trade of Bombay : that the Bill, if it became law, would restrict business, and reduce the export of Cotton. And the Commander-in-Chief had approvingly quoted passage in which it was stated that the suppression of time-bargains would be unjustifiable interference with free trade; and although primarily injuring Cotton dealers and Cotton merchants, would re-act through them, on the producer, would check the prosperity of the ryot, and reduce the cultivation of the staple." Now let any one read the Bill candidly. Was there any provision of a repressive character in it? Was there anything to justify the statements in the Petitions? or the idea, to which forcible expression had so often been given, that the Bill would authorise an attack people's pockets? He (the President) must confess, that considering how the terms of the misstated in these Petitions, he must decline to attach that weight to them, which the influential affixed to them seemed first sight to demand.

His Excellency Sir William Mansfield had quoted a passage in which Mr. Goschen* met the complaints made by the Court of Bankruptcy against the system of blank credits, to which the system of engaging in timebargains had been declared to be analogous. The point of Mr. Goschen's argument was, that the system could not be condemned, because it had often been abused—at all events not until it became evident that the abuses which followed in its wake were greater than the advantages which it received. Now he (the President) did not pretend to any great knowledge of this subject, but what bearing, he would ask, Mr. Goschen's argument on the principle of this Bill? Would His Excellency apply Mr. Goschen's argument to prove that there any difficulty in a Judge discriminating between Blank Credit and bond fide Credit, or between legitimate and fictitious inland Drafts? and if not, then the argument, of far in it the principle of the Bill, falls altogether to the ground. Again, Jeremy Bentham had been quoted to show that those most useful institutions (our Insurance Offices) depended for their success upon the existence of a speculative spirit among their supporters. But he could not that this argument had any real bearing on the Bill.

Again, the wide scope of this had been remarked on. It had been objected that the will affect persons living beyond this Presidency. But was it to be understood that Opium dealing in Malwa, or any other kind of traffic in any other part of India, would be really interfered with by this Bill? To say surely to misrepresent the scope of the Bill.

Again, the Honorable Mr. Cassels urged what appeared to him a strange argument against this Bill. He said that in England where centuries of education and moral training had introduced general code of honor among all classes, the Legislature had repealed the laws which permitted the recovery of money voluntarily paid to a winner. He objected to the enactment of such laws in India, because, as he said, there was not the same code of honor to regulate the conduct of the people in this country. He said that in India, the first principles of good faith were scarcely recognised by the seem of the people, and he asked whether in a land in which fraud was rampant, and perjury stalked barefaced through the Courts of law, it me safe to declare that contracts may bebroken, and that law and principle are antagonistic. Now, without waiting to discuss whether the correctly described not, he (the President) would confidently appeal to the native Members of that Council to bear him out in the protest he would enter against the very sweeping in which the Hon'ble Mr. Cassels and characterised the commercial morality of the people of this country. Commercial morality was not of a low type in India. remembered a controversy which arose many years ago between Sir Charles Forbes and the Bishop of London. It turned on the relative commercial morality of Western and Eastern Nations. He very much struck by a remark made by Sir Charles Forbes that in his long experience in India he had never known a hoondee be repudiated. That were remarkable statement, but he believed the truth of it would come home to most people who have had intercourse with native merchants, even up to the present date and he believed the amount of writing which passed between commercial among the natives much less than among Europeans. They trusted much to each other's commercial good faith. Unless he mistaken in this point, there special in this country for referring to judicial tribunals disputes which in Europe were settled among the parties themselvess This exactly what the proposed to do. It must its object to teach morality or immorality. It simply aimed at leaving such matters to the mercantile parties to deal with among themselves, and provided only that a certain class of should not come Before the Court for adjudication.

He (the President) trusted that the Council would not attach a wider meaning to the Bill. It was not a repressive measure, it did not aim minterfering with any one, it did not aim at teaching morality. It was simply meaning to adjudicate a certain class of cases, and ought not to be considered in any other light.

[The Bombay Survey and Settlement Bill; Second Reading.]

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE said:—After what had been stated in the petitions* laid before the Council that day, he was unwifting to let the Bill be read a second time without bearing his personal testimony to its being a most valuable and necessary measure, and one, a far as he could judge, singularly free from all the objections which had been stated against it. Nearly thirty years had passed since he personally connected with the operations which hed to the commencement of the Survey in this Presidency, and himself employed in the districts in which the Survey first introduced. It was impossible to give any one who had not the country at the time he was speaking of idea of how this India, which is always said to be so immutable, had changed for the better, and how much of that change was due to good for administration, steadily and consistently carried out.

The principle of the Bill was two-fold—1st, It stereotyped the change to which he had adverted, by confirming the past proceedings of the Survey Department; and 2ndly, It made provision for the future prosecution of the same beneficial process hereafter. To give man idea of the state of this part of the country before the changes in the Revenue system to which he alluded had been introduced, he would briefly describe the condition of the people of the Deccan in he man them in the year 1835, when shortly after his arrival in this country, he was employed as an Assistant of Mr. H. E. Goldsmid, whose man could never be mentioned without regret at the early loss of man of the most valuable and devoted servants this Government had ever possessed. Mr. Goldsmid sent to inquire into certain charges of mismanagement in of the districts of the Poons Collectorate. The whole of the Decran. had been or less exhausted by the and mismanagement of former Governments. The removal of the native Court and Army had destroyed the local market for produce. No foreign trade adequate to supply its place had grown up; the prices of agricultural produce and of labour in for years been steadily falling, and the Government revenue steadily decreasing. But what most attracted the attention of Mr. Williamson Ramsay, well known the sole and most able Revenue Commissioner of that time, we the extreme difficulty with which even an inadequate amount of revenue extorted from the cultivators : and he deputed Mr Goldsmid and Lieutenant (now Colonel) Shortrede to inquire into the truth of the charges of oppression which had been made against the Revenue officers of the district he referred to. The situation was shortly this: Rarely more than two-thirds of the culturable land in any district were under cultivation. Frequently as much as two-thirds of the land were waste. Villages almost deserted ____ frequently to be met with | some were "bechiragh," without a light in them, utterly uninhabited. The people sunk in the lowest depths of poverty; they had few recognised rights in the land , the boundaries of the different villages and different estates _____ often unsettled, and gave rise to disputes which there were not the most of finally deciding. The revenue to be derived from the land was practically dependent on the discretion of the local officers. There were, it true, fixed customary rates which nominally regulated the assessment to be paid. But they much higher than could possibly be paid at the then existing prices of produce, that it was necessary to grant remissions of the necessity for and extent of which the local officers were the sole judges, and it thus practically left to a very ill-paid class of inferior officials to decide what should be taken from the people.

The results of such a system might be easily guessed. In good seasons the people forced to pay to the uttermost farthing, without having the certainty that what they paid really went to the Government Treasury. In bad if they unable to obtain remissions they had no but to leave the country and seek subsistence elsewhere.

He (the President) had seen many of the victims of this most wretched system. People had been brought before Mr. Goldsmid who deposed to having been tortured in the most cruel manner in consequence of their inability to meet the demand of the Native Collectors. They had been exposed to the heat of the sun, and forced to stand with large stones on their heads, or to lie down with heavy weights laid m their chests. This state of things was reported by Mr. Williamson Ramsay, the Revenue Commissioner, to the Government. He showed that the fault lay less with the under-paid officials than with the Government itself, who required from their servants impossibility, viz., to realise the assessments of the most prosperous day of the Maratha empire, when prices had fallen far below their former amount. He urged the injustice of entrusting such powers to ill-trained officials at a distance from all effective control, without taking the proper precautions of giving them such a salary as would place them above the influence of temptation. He pointed out a truth which is generally recognised and acted on, that the true secret of a good land system is moderation in demand, that if the demands were moderate, cultivation would certainly increase; that the cultivators would be sure to prosper; and that in their prosperity the State would share. It - happened that these suggestions fell - kindly ground. Sir Bobert Grant then Governor of Bombay, than whom a more able statesman or larger hearted philanthropist has been at the head of the Government of any Presidency.* On Bobert Grant arrived in Bombay on the 12th March 1836, we will det at Poons on the 9th of July 1888. Never did the loss of a public wan, says an eminent writer, "give rise to a larger amount of mourning, or of the deep or deep or linear. Men of professions, opinions and designations concurred in doing honor his memory. In the pious, benevotent, and just,—a devout subspiper in the Church and in the bosom of his family—and an example of propriety to all."

Following tribute to his memory me gold by the late Sir min Pollard Willoughby Bart, me public meeting assembled to devise means memorating worth;—

receiving the Revenue Commissioner's reports he cordially sympathized with his views, and charged him to that the great principles to which he had given expression of these orders. Lieutenant Wingate associated with Mr. Goldamid with view to devise complete plan for general Survey, and equitable assessment of all Government land. These gentlemen were ably seconded by several officers chiefly drawn from the Army. And he (the President) might remark that this sees only one of the many occasions which the

"His application to his multifarious and laborious duties was incement and devoted; and I conscientionally believe will if this me not the immediate cause, it hastened the calamity which is so universally deplored throughout me presidency. Robert Grant, from the purest and most conscientious motives, was accustomed to me nothing for granted : but by a rigid and impartial investigation into the merits of each case, to eatinfy himself of the right course to be pursued before he passed a decision. Few man aware of the extent of business which, under the system prescribed by the last Charter, [the Charter Act of 1888,] devolves on the Government of India, or how largely it has, within the last three years, increased at this presidency. The fact | our lamented Governor fell into an exactly opposite to that which, by some, has been ascribed to him. He worked beyond his strength : he add [particularly at the grant of his administration,] to do too much with his me hand, and to see everything with his own sye. Hence I admit, that, in see cates, delays did occur, and to these another sees contributed, which, however it may slighly affect his character . a public man, enhanced worth as individual, m indicating the kindness and benevolence of his disposition : his desire, in more degree hadable, though sometimes practically injurious, to give a decision the least disagreeable to im parties."

"We deeply indebted to Sir Robert Grant's energy and care, for giving, as it were, the first and most powerful impulse to a system of general improvement, which, be be hoped, will be charished by his summer. Nor must your Committee allow manoticed the considerate attention (Grant bestowed on representations from the mercantile community—the readiness with which all obstructions were removed, and every facility most to trade, whenever it was within the competency of his government to effect either; warm advocacy always accorded to all applications for relief from injurious restrictions, when such relief could only obtained from higher authority; clearly attent desire place footing, which would best conduce extension, and consequent increase of which yields to the state."

Government of India had been indebted to the Army for who had rendered the most effective—in the general administration of the country. It should only weary the Council I he to describe the different parts taken by these officers in the operations of the Survey. He could not however, refrain from mentioning the foundation of the gentlemen to whom at the the supervision of this duty—entrusted, and to whose zeal and ability in laying the foundation the excellence of the superstructure is mainly due.

Lieutenant Nash, of the Bombay Engineers, of the first and ablest of their number, we more. Lieutenant (now Colonel) Gaisford, and Lieutenant (now Major) Davidson, and long since retired from the service, and both, he believed, still living a life of active benevolence in their native country. Two of the original officers, however, of that time, Colonels J. T. Francis and W. C. Anderson, had been throughout in active charge of Survey operations, and were, he was glad to say, the head of the Survey Department; they had never ceased to preserve with religious fidelity the great principle which had been laid down by Messrs. Wingate and Goldsmid.* It was but a small part of the praise to which these officers will richly entitled, to say the success of the Revenue Survey in the Bombay Presidency depended in a great measure upon their high qualifications and tried character.

[&]quot;Lieutenant Wingste, speaking of him as in the time of the Indapoor settlement, after serving with marked distinction for some years in the Survey Department, maturing its operations, and inaugurating many usoful reforms in the system of the Presidency, eventually retired services in 1853. Living in retirement map public life, when when the services in this country long manacknowledged by the State; on the recent creation of

The results of the Survey bave been summarised in that most striking statement' from which extracts had that duy been quoted by His Excellency Sir William Mansfield. It might be said that it sometimes difficult to judge of practical results from mere statistical convinced from personal observation that this was the min the present instance. If any one were to visit the places of which he had spoken, he would find that the statements which had been laid before them that day failed to give any adequate idea of the whole tunth. In fact, bere figures could not describe the progress that had taken place in any district where the Survey rates of assessment had been long in operation. Cultivition had increased to a truly remarkable extent; so much so, that he (the President) believed it would be difficult matter now to find anywhere in the Decoun even . thousand acres of unoccupied culturable land available to any one wishing to take up land for cultivation. Land was not only occupied but valued, the Honorable Mr. Premabhai had described it, "as their lives" by those to whom it belonged whereas it formerly often happened that the ill-governed territories of the Nizam and other native princes gave a refuge to those who had been forced by ment to abandon their succestral lands in man own territory.

The increase in the public was perhaps still striking than the increase in cultivation. But he (the President) would always in estimating the benefits of the Survey give but a secondary place to the increase of Government revenue. For it had been clearly laid down by the Government which originated the Survey that financial considerations were to be held of minor importance, the Egalted Order of the seem of India, we pleasing to his many seem in the conatry to find a name amongst the list of the distinguished servants of the State whom Majesty has been graciously pleased to appoint to be Enighte Commanders of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India."

tenure and modaertion of assessment, and to the consequent improvein a condition of the Ryots, than to the direct increase of land revenue. It had always been telt that if these objects kept in view revenue would also be indirectly improved; and in attaining these objects the Government had always had the hearty co-operation of the Survey Officers themselves. In judging of these results it was impossible to over-estimate the obligations of the Government and the country to the Survey Officers who year after year had devoted themselves to the very important but monotonous and trying duties of their department, with a perseand zeal which am beyond praise.

If he (the President) wished to show a foreigner how the English keep India, he would show him men of this stamp, who, living habitually far remote from Presidency towns and large stations, by their free association with the people of the country, and by the expression of a sincere sympathy with their wants, promoted their welfare, and attracted the affection and respect of the agricultural classes to the British Government.

But it not only in the regulation of the Land Revenue that the labours of the Survey Officers had been conspicuously useful. They had had a large share in ____ of the most useful ____ for the general improvement of the country, and conspicuously so in matters relating to the improvement of roads and means of transit. He remembered coming, nearly thirty years ago, from Bombay to Poona vid Panwell by a post cart—the only wheeled postal conveyance then existing in India. During the whole journey, he did not recollect seeing a dozen carts. The only means of transporting merchandize was by Brinjarce bullocks; of these the traveller from Panwell to Poons in those days met tens of thousands, carrying down cotton and grain to Panwell, and taking back salt, cloth and other imported goods to the interior. Beyond Poons, were then very rarely In five months he remembered seeing only three carts in the districts between Poons and pore, and these brought from Madras station. In only indigenous cart-wheels ____ at that time mere discs _ stone ; ____

large lumbering contrivances, and remained as heirlooms in families for generations. They were - heavy that it took eight or ten bullocks to draw them when loaded. They not used for the carriage of ordinary produce; but only for carting manure to the fields. Now the first step towards improving the physical condition of agricultural people in a low state of civilization is to give them increased facilities of communication. Lieute-Wingate and Gaisford early apprehended this fact, and applied themselves to increase the facilities of transit in the Deccan. They had if first very small means at their disposal for the attainment of this object. The Government at first gave Lieutenant Wingate small sums, often as low - Rs. | per mile, for the improvement of roads. Little could of _____ be done for such an amount beyond removing the most serious impediments to wheeled traffic along existing tracks; but even this ___ great boon to the country. Lieutenant Gaisford then applied himself to improve the country cart. The ordinary Decean cart in its present form was the result of his labours, and it would be difficult to convey to any one, who had not witnessed it, an adequate notion of the amount of time, trouble, thought and contrivance which applied to invent = cart which should meet all the conditions required. It me to be as light and cheap me possible, and yet strong enough to be used in a stony country, where roads were almost unknown, and where artificers capable of repairing the most simple wheeled vehicle ____ often not to be found within fifty miles.

Lieutenant Gaisford set up a manufactory for these carts Imboornee in the Sholapoor districts, and there he not only made carts but trained artificers from the villages around to repair them. At first it difficult to find any one who would buy the carts even cost price, except as a favour; now they have entirely replaced not only the old carts with stone wheels, but the Brinjaree bulkscks which formerly did the whole carrying work of the country. And the carts have in their turn helped the improvement of old roads and the opening of new lines of communication. If the Survey had conferred no other benefits the country by contributing they had done towards the formation good repaid all the expense incurred on account of it.

Other equally important improvements in the general administration of the country had been greatly aided by the officers of the Survey, whose advice and assistance had always been found to be most valuable by the fiscal and magisterial officers of Government—by none sum than by the present Revenue Commissioners (Hon'ble Messrs. William Hart and B. H. Ellis,) and the Honorable Member in charge of the Bill.

One main object of the Survey has been to ascertain and confirm the rights of the occupants of the land. There could be no doubt to the existence of proprietory rights in land in the Deccan in former ages, but they had been m impaired by years of misgovernment and over assessment, that their very existence made the subject of formal inquiry during the early years after conquest of the country, as will be seen by a reference to Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone's first report the Deccan Provinces. It was always a fundamental principle in the Survey operations not to attempt to force on the country any particular theory m to the ownership of land, or the rights and liabilities of occupants and proprietors. Their object simply to ascertain and record facts as they existed. But as regarded the rights of occupants as against Government, this made a most important concession by affirming the right of all occupants to continued possession after the expiration of the period of settlement; and the Council will be glad to hear that since this drafted, the Secretary of State had given his sanction to the view held by this Government un this subject. The Honorable Mr. Jagannath Sankarsett would bear him out in the statement that the result of the policy adopted by this Government had been to raise the value of land in the Deccan to = extent which it would have been vain to hope for ten years ago.

In sinuated, rather than broadly stated, that there are great risk of the agricultural classes being oppressed by the ill-paid for the Survey Department. He (the President) could only say that since his return to this Presidency after an absence of some years, he had not heard of a single complaint of any subordinate in Department making improper use of his powers in Survey Officer. It might perhaps be thought that this assertion proved too much, and that in such large establishments there must be occasional of malversation; but he might that rule, these establishments are well looked after. Deserving bers and quickly promoted, and a good Survey Officer will find his way into the general administration of the country. The promotion of trustworthy men, we the emulation thus excited would no doubt partly account for the remarkable absence of complaint against the Department, but the system has also been very carefully arranged so m to minimize the possibility of subordinate officer making illicit gains. The work has been so divided that any one member of the establishment has but a small idea of the effect his own work will have method the general result of the settlement. Little temptation, therefore, is left to persons affected by the settlement to bribe subordinate officers.

Looking to all these facts to which he had very briefly alluded. he (the President) thought the Survey system might fairly be described the great Charter of the rights of the agricultural population. That the Khotee petitioners failed to see this only natural. They, like the Zemindars in Bengal, occupied the position of middle-men between the ryot and the Government. Every calculated to promote the interests of the ryots must to extent trench on the profits and powers of a middleman, and where any doubt existed as to the precise operation of a like this, some alarm and mistrust would naturally be excited. The tone of period of the petitions need therefore no prise. Indeed, if no objections had been raised by these petitioners. there would have been reason to doubt how far the Bill likely to benefit the occupants and actual and of the land. The petitions came, he believed, exclusively from the Southern Concan Kho+sh, in whose villages the Survey had not been yet introduced, and he (the President) and no doubt that when the operations of the Survey extended to District, the Khotes would find, all connected with the land had found everywhere else, that the Survey would confer on them very great substantial benefite.

He entirely agreed with the amendments proposed by the Honorable Mr. Madhavarao Vithal Vinchurkar. His proposals fell in entirely with the general scheme of Survey, and with the original suggestions of Major Wingate on this very subject; but this me not the proper time to discuss them. For the present, he would only thank the Honorable Member for the suggestions.

He sorry to detain the Council long; but he thought only just to the Petitioners and to the Survey Department to views length. The Hon'ble Mr. Inversity, he knew, would give ample time for the consideration of all reasonable objections that might be raised, but he trusted no unnecessary delay would be allowed in passing this most valuable measure into Law.

[The Revenue Survey and Settlement Bill.]

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frenz remarked that the application for more time to consider the provisions of the Bill did not when carefully examined, seem to him to rest on any reasonable foundation. Some opposition was naturally to be expected, from superior holders; for their rights were to a certain extent, similar to those of Government. The proposed to restrict by legal enactment the action of Government Officers in regard to the demands from occupants, and to this extent superior holders also affected. But = the petitioners had had ample time to state, specific objections, and had urged none, he - no reason for delay. The petitioners had, he thought, had quite sufficient time to criticize the measure. The Council had received very fair criticism on several matters of detail from a gentleman living in Kattiawar. If Mr. Gaorishanker Oodeshankar, the able Dewan of His Highness the Thakore of Bhownaggar, could find time for considering the details of the Bill, surely it scarcely fair for living in Bombay to complain of the haste with which the Bill being hurried through its stages. If the petitioners had any really valid objections to make to the Bill, he (the President) felt men that they would have put these "objections in a tangible and specific shape. They both of them men of note and education. Mr. Cursetji Nassarwanji Cama - a gentleman who was well known to all classes of the community, and Mr. Vishvanath Narayan Mandik most favourably known to the public gentleman of the highest education, well able to write plead in English as any gentleman | that table, and | of the ablest Vakeels of the High Court. Mr. Cama could not say how his interests specifically by the Bill. Mr. Mandlik himself, by family connection, a Khote. Apparently he of appearing himself, he every way qualified appear, and when he would have been sure of attentive hearing Committee, he appears by Counsel, (Mr. C. P. Cooper, Barrister-at-Law,) who out by saying not quainted with the details of the and requires study it and get up a case against it. If there were a shadow of ground delaying the consideration of the Bill, he (the President) would gladly have acceded to the request of the petitioners. As was, and not think they would be justified in agreeing to an indefinite postponement of a useful a measure, such a vague statement of objections to it.

[The Bombay Municipal Bill.]

His Excellence Sie H. B. Frene agreed with the Hon'ble Mesars. White and Lewis that the first thing to be considered the necessity for any taxation. It was quite impossible to invent any tax which should not be open to criticism. Therefore, the Council must consider, not much whether there were objections to License Tax as whether they could without and whether it must be best tax which would give what they required. It would have been satisfactory to have had a clear financial statement of the Municipal accounts, but appeared to be great difficulty in obtaining such a statement. They here the statement which the Hon'ble Mr Enverarity would bye and bye put in in a formal shape, and which was said to be the best information they could get from the Municipality. That statement made out a clear deficiency of 14 lakhe of rupees. Mr. White took exception to it and showed that it me not altogether trustworthy. The Council had, therefore, to consider whether, before deciding the necessity of this tax. there was any reasonable chance of getting a clear and correct of the liabilities of the Municipality. He must coufess that | looking | the state of confusion in which the past management and accounts of the Municipality found to be, the chances of the Council getting such a statement appeared to be very scanty. The only way in which an entirely estisfactory account of the Municipal fund could have been obtained would have been by appointing a Commission similar to a Parliamentary Commission, to inquire into the state of the fund, but such a course was not feasible within any reasonable period. In this country, all information of this kind could be obtained only from Government officials and from non-official gentlemen who gave up their valuable time for the purpose. Government had constant evidence of the great value of the assistance thus obtained, but of course there ■ limit to it, and in this particular question regarding this particular Bill it seemed to him they had gone as far me they could in taxing the time and the attention of the non-official gentlemen who had the ability and the will to aid them. Honorable members must bear in mind that this Bill and drawn up from the best information the Municipal Commissioners themselves could give them. It was then taken up by a gentleman (the Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Cassels,) who not only had an accurate knowledge of the wants of Bombay, but who had particular talent, m they had had repeated proofs in the _____ of the discussion of this Bill, for legislative questions. That gentleman - sided by the members of the Government* who sat with him in Committee. They applied to the Bench of Justices, a body which had the charge of the Municipality, and whom the Council could best look for information. He spoke under correction, but he believed that up to this moment, the Council had not had any criticism upon from the Bench of Justices. In thought they without mexpression of their views, and he did not think that by waiting any longer the Council would be able to obtain much better information in regard to the financial condition of the Municipality. Looking then the statement which the Honorable Mr. Inversity had laid on the table, and omitting from the debit side all the items which admitted of being postponed, that to say, payments to Government and other bodies, of sums which were due for work already done, the current expenditure would be found to be the following:--For the Police, 4 lakhs of Rupees; water supply, 12 lakhe; drainage, 22 lakhe; scavengering and watering 64 lakha : office establishment, 2 lakha : repairs, 1 lakh : metalling tho roads. I lakhs; petry repairs, 14 lakhs; works actually in progress such - Colaba Causeway and others 64 lakhs, making a total of This estimate the Council should observe provided for no new works, it provided for payment of no debt, and it very imperfectly provided for the drainage which had been me down at 25 lakhs within the year, and he did not need to tell the Council that it would be a long time working at the Sate of only 24 lakhs per annum before the town was sufficiently drained. On the other side there was a total of 14% lakes of current revenue derived from the following sources:-House tax 5% lakes of Runees : Wheel tax. 2 lakhs : fees 12 lakhs : sundries, 2 lakhs ; and Police rate, 4 lakhs, m that there were 144 lakhs of Rupees to meet 304 lakhs of charges. The Council must admit that this made out a very grave case of insolvency if the information before the Council could be relied on. This - certainly the best information available to the Council, and he (the President) thought therefore that Mr. Cassels had made out a very strong case for increased assets. He would assume therefore that a case had been made out for man additional taxation, and guestion that next was, what should ? what the least objectionable tax they could devise? Here they met by the objection that the license tax was an imperial one, and that objection opened up wery wide question. On that point might observe that there seemed to be inherent possible distinction between m imperial and a local tax beyond this, that an imperial tax one which the Supreme Government decided be appropriated to imperial purposes; and a local tax and one which the Supreme Government permitted a local Government to devote to local purposes. As he was not aware of any why Supreme Government should object to | local License Tax | professions, trades and callings, he did not think there could be any objection taken to it in this Council on the ground of its being imperial tax. On the merits of direct and indirect taxation he could only quote the general feeling that subject. They could recollect how very unpopular the Income Tax in England when it mes first proposed. Its popularity, in some respects, has not all increased, but the general opinion now was that it is one of the best taxes that could be devised. He am not think, therefore, that on this ground any argument would be valid against the License Tax. It objected to the tax that it was partial in its operation, that while traders had to pay it, those who mot also traders, but who had realised property, and those who were servants of Government, escaped. But they could not expect absolute perfection in the operation of their taxes; an absolutely perfect tax was a thing utterly unknown. The might take any tax, and they would find it an extremely easy thing to make out and of partiality in connection with it. It had been argued that a License Tax tax upon the trading community, and did not touch those who lived by realised property. He need hardly remind the Conneil that those who are unconnected with trade and professions of areas kind in this city, was by me mann a large, or very numerous, as he might say a very wealthy body, as most of those who had large incomes from realised property were in man way on other engaged in trade. It also alleged that servants of Government escaped; but if a License Tax charged upon them, it would be sarv to make provision for increase their calaries, and this increase of salaries would have to be paid by the tax payers, so relief would be given to the community by levying the in from Government servants. As regards the charge of inequality in the incidence of the tax on the classes of the community, might be justly answered that if distinctions of lime and a second callings were made too fine, much difficulty would be found in the work of classifying, and a great temptation to fraud would im given as well to the taxpayer, as to those who had to sesens itax. On ground a rough classification with few classes was generally found not only me regards the Government but me regards me people themselves to be desired than scheme with curious and nice distinctions; which though they fitted more exactly with the different ranks of the community, still involved a great of trouble in the collection of the tax. Mr. White had pointed out that this License Tax tax, and that the Stall Tax in operation in former years, and we been repealed because it had been found a very bad tax. If he (the President) was not mistaken. the Shop and Stall Tax sholished in order that the Town Duties might be imposed. Now that the Town Duties was to be removed, it was reasonable that a substitute should be provided for them, seeing that it was not proved that a substitute could be dispensed with.

[&]quot;His Excellency Sir W. B. Mansfield, K. C. B., the Hon'ble Messrs, W. Frere and A. D. Robertson. The non-afficial members on this Committee were, the Hon'ble Messrs, Jaganusth Sankarsett, H. W. R. Cassels.

[The Hon'ble Walter Richard Cassels.]

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere said that before putting the third reading of the Bombay Municipal Bill, he would tender to Honorable Mr. Cassels the acknowledgments of the Council for his unremitting labours in connection with the present Bill.

These labours, he regretted to say, had been close and unremitting have injured Mr. Cassels' health and had contributed to render necessary his immediate departure from India; but Mr. Cassels might be assured that would have reason regret time and trouble he had expended in behalf of the people of Bombay not only in labour that bestowed that Bill, but every measure which had been before them since he had been in Council, as well in various capacities not connected with legislation but of great importance to the Island. The Municipal Bill owed much of its completeness also to the labours of the Hou'ble Mr. J. S. White. But it and only due to Mr. Cassels, now that he about to leave Bombay, that he (the President) should express to him the best thanks of Government for his valuable services in Council.

[Death of The Hon'ble Jagannath Sankarsett.]

His Excellency Sir H. B. In Frere said that the Council indebted to the Honorable Mr. B. H. Ellis' for giving expression to their feelings at the loss which they had sustained. Mr. Ellis had truly said that the loss could not easily be replaced. It would be felt very keenly indeed by the whole community and would be felt in a special second by the Bombay Government. The citizens of Bombay had lately shown their high estimation of the Honorable Jagannath Sankarsett by voting him a statue, to honour which had rarely been shown to a living man. By the successive Governors of Bombay since the time of Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone, their late colleague had been held in the highest esteem. From his very early you'd he had been invariably consulted by the Government when it proposed to introduce any which affected the welfare of the native community. Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone had the advantage of his advice in framing his educational scheme. and not one of his (the President's) predecessors had failed consult Mr. Jagannath Sankarsett whenever it became desirable ascertain the feelings of the people in regard to any important ure. It me seldom that it full to the lot of a private person to be so consulted. But though it always felt that Mr. Jagannath Sankarsett would truly represent the wishes of the people, with all whose wants and desires he heartily sympathised, still he always trusted = a true and valued friend of the Government. for he thoroughly understood and sympathied with the policy of the British Government in India. Sir George Clerk recognized his worth when he appointed him and of the first members of the Council. His services in the Council well known to them all and very highly appreciated by the present Government. This expression of their sincere regret would be recorded in the minutes of the Council, and would be published with mi report of the meeting.

[The Bombay Town Duties Bill.]

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere said:—As the Honorable Member (Mr. Mangaldass Nathubloy,) has referred to what I said

On the 19th January 1866, His Excellency Sir Robert Napier K. C. B., [now Lord Rapier of Magdala, G. C. B., G. C. S. I.,] for the first time Bombay Council, on his appointment of Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay Army.

After the proceedings of the Council had terminated that day, Sir Robert Hapter in he begged to express his satisfaction at being again associated in the business of the State with His Excellency in Bartle Frere and in Hon'ble Mr. C. J.

Erakine, and also at having an opportunity of giving his humble support to in Hon'ble Council of this Presidency in the course of progress for which it had been so distinguished, supportantly since His Excellency had been in the head of this Government.

the occasion when the duties removed, I shall make two observations we the statement which he is just made. In the first instance, I would beg to say that, as far as I was judge from the very cursory inspection I made a short time ago, I could quite agree with the dreadful picture that the honorable member drew of Bomboy as a ruined city, with rents falling, and all taste for luxury extinct. I must say Bombay a few weeks ago looked to me lively it usually does in the rains, and containing fully much taxable property at any time during the 82 years I have man it. Possibly it is not spending its money quite so fast; but I am glad the honorable member has given me an opportunity of recording my conviction, that the springs of the material prosperity of Bombay, its sound commerce, and its resources for taxing itself, ___ great now as at any time during the last five years. Whatever I might think regarding the form of taxation which the honorable member proposes, and regarding which I should desire like the other members my opinion until the discussion of the principle of the Bill, I should consider it almost imperative upon to allow L sideration of any Bill which came before - Bill desired by a majority of the Bench of Justices. It is taking nothing from the well-carned honors of the Municipal Commissioner* to say, that to Bench of Justices having used the powers given them by the recent Municipal Act is due immense deal of the improvement which is apparent in Bombay, and that they have set themselves vigorously to support him, and especially by seeking to know how they really stood, and what their to meet their expenditure. On this ground, I am enabled fully to agree with my honorable friend. that men for the first time during a great many years past, we have prospect of knowing how we stand with regard to our wants and resources in Bombay. But while fully admitting the right of the Bench to sak met men to allow this Bill to be considered, I would point and to my honorable friend that, in omitting to state the list of articles he proposes for taxation, he omits a most essential part of his Bill; because those who have strong objections to this particular form of taxation, would find their objections very considerably modified according to the nature of the tariff. The which the honorable member makes out is, that the Council mistaken as what the imposed by the existing would be likely to produce; that mistaken in that point; and that we also mistaken in supposing that fixed property in Bombay I lightly taxed than in other parts of India. Supposing, when we men to discuss the Bill, that he able to make out these two points, he would be able to establish a very strong ground for our considering any form of taxation which he might lay before us. He would say, "There certain work to be done towards the future improvement of Bombay greater than the income at our disposal can meet, and look wou to means." I think we should be bound to give these means, but whether this shall be done by adopting the proposed Town Duties, depends entirely to whether the proposition he may place before us open to the same objections as the old Town Duties or not. I may make this statement, because it is the only opportunity I may have of pointing out to my friend what may be called the strong point of his Bill when he introduces it. Suppose he proposes to tax luxuries, then the objection to such a form of taxation would be reduced to an objection to the interference it would cause to trade, of the vexation m annovance which might be caused by the levying of the tax. It would not at all touch any question connected with On the other hand, if he were to revert to man of the old which have been alredy removed by the Council, such the grain m building materials. I for an would consider the objection imposing a tax on such materials as quite insuperable. The honorable member adverted to the fact that the late town duties which yielded such a large amount of duty men not unpopular, and ____ felt. He is doubtless aware that the popularity and unpopularity of such a tax depends upon its being perceptible. But the some of the grain did know for certain that there was any tax upon it, that fact concealed from them, and they were generally aware of it, and me they never thought that the high price of grain was at all enhanced by taxation Therefore the popularity or unpopularity of minvisible milike this, an indirect tax, very little of argument for or against it. It may be the most vicious tax possible, and may not be unpopular. As to its being unfelt and having no effect upon prices, it may be difficult to trace the effect; it may be difficult to show how it acts, but the honorable member will, I ware, agree with me reflection, that whatever taxation is imposed, however small it may be, it must pro tanto enhance the price, and it must so far be felt. The result of all this is, that when the honorable member lavs his Bill before us, I hope he will the time put before us the particulars of the articles which he proposes to tax. Speaking merely for myself, I should say that, supposing he made out his case of insufficient means and miscalculation of the yield of the present taxation, my view of any new town duty would be affected by the nature of the articles he proposed to tax. I can imagine articles to which most members of the Council would agree, if we could get the Government of India to agree also, for his argument must be one which must carry with it the Government of India also. There is one other point to which the honorable member referred-the example of Bengal and the North-West Provinces, of France and Algeria. On that point I would only say, that very generally country imagines itself to be in advance of other countries, and I do not think he would expect me to go back altogether to modes of taxation which have been proved to be evil, me if he showed us that they existed in France. With regard to examples in this part of the world, I hear a very great outcry against this form of taxation in other parts of India. It considered perfect and unobjectionable when it introduced into the Central Provinces; but somehow or other I have heard a great outery against the octroi system in the Central Provinces, and I believe he will find that it is not accepted so universally in the Punjab and North. West Provinces as believes, unless it is placed upon mat ers of luxury.

[The Bombay Town Duties Bill,* First Reading.]

His Excellency Str H. B. E. Frere said :- Before I put the question, I should like once _____ to repeat to my honorable friend (Mr. Mangaldam Nathubhoy,) what I pointed out to him when he applied for leave to bring in the Bill, and what may be unpalatable advice, but what I am certain he will find of value when he comes to look at this question in detail. am sure that all the honorable members of this Council who heard his speech when he moved for leave to introduce the Bill will agree with - that he has done most excellent service, a member of the Bench of Justices and as member of this Council, in the mode in which he brought the question before the Council. But what I wish to point out to him is, and I gather it is the opinion of the Honorable Mr. Erskine also, that he has not placed the question before us precisely in the form in which the Council untilmately deal with it. As I mentioned when he first applied for leave to bring in the Bill, the opinious of the Council, to great extent, must depend upon the articles to be taxed. He says, and I believe he made out a very strong case for carrying us with him. that there is a great want of efficient means for carrying out all the improvements of drainage, ventilation, and all the great works of a sanitary kind, including water supply, which the Bench of Justices had in hand. But before he presses to undo the step which deliberately taken only a short time ago, I think he should furnish us with something of detail to the extent of its necessity. It may be that the deficiency is very large or very small. We cannot exactly tell what it is until the Commissioner is able to put before as his estimates of the works which he proposes to undertake, and has made a complete estimate of the means which he thinks he will have when he has carried out to their full extent all the present possesses. From what I know, from what I have seen, both of the water supply and the drainage, I think it will be cometime before it will be possible for the Commissioner to tell me how much he wants. Until me have such a statement before us, I think the Council will be very likely to say that the honorable member is premature in supposing that there is such a deficit a cannot be met by the means at the disposal of the Bench, or by slight increase, it may be one-half or per cent. upon the House Tax or man other slight increase and the present system of taxation. But let m suppose that he has proved the question of deficiency. and that he has proved that some was tax must be imposed, it will still remain to be considered whether this tax which he puts before ns is the best tax which we could have. I may only remind my honorable friend of what I have on other occasions said to him, that m far as I am concerned as a member of this Council, I feel very insuperable objections to Town Duties in the usual sense in which the words " Town Duties" are understood. As Mr. Erskine pointed out, - cannot apply that to the whole of the present scheme, because parts of the scheme may be carried out without imposing what I consider to be a Town Duty proper, Having had some little experience in former days when Town Duties were common in this Presidency, I shall state what my objections are. I shall refer to Town Duties me they existed in this city of Poons. The Town Duties - they operated in Poons - practically a monopoly in the hands of certain great merchants and rarely collected at the limits of the Town. There were salt merchants, grain merchants, metal merchants, and others, and the firms who carried on a trade in each of these articles known, to all the people who were employed in the collection of the Duties. In a great many cases, I know-in the of salt for instance—the person who had the greatest share in the trade in salt me the person who farmed the Town Duties, and when the traffic came to the town limits, it was passed in, in general way, with the man in charge of the packed bullocks = carts-there == very few carts in those days-and went to the owner's warehouse with very little search, with very little inquiry, and very little delay. The poor or any interloping trader fared but badly. He might be kept for days waiting outside the town until he paid the salt duty to the Town Duty collector, made a complaint to the collector, or until he managed to get past. But a general rule, the collection of the Town Duties did not form any serious bar to the great trade of the country. The great . articles passed in and out of Poons with very little interruption. need hardly remind my honorable friend that that is a state of things which supposes a very simple and primitive mode of carrying = commerce and any which is perfectly inapplicable to a place like Bombay. You could not revert to it even in such a place on Poons. It would be quite impossible to re-impose Town Duties in Poons in the mode in which they formerly existed. If you re-imposed them in Poons now, and if you re-imposed them in Bombay, you do put on the general trade of the country a very serious interruption burden: and whether you taxed the articles - not the mere fact of stopping trade to what articles being transported. to see whether the packages contain opium, . ghee, any other sort of commodity, is in itself a great impediment to trade. That is of the objections which I would remind my honorable friend he would have to overcome. It will not be sufficient to refer to other places where Town Duties | levied, and to say that they levied in France, or in the Punjaub and in the Central Provinces, and are found to be a very popular and a very efficient means of raising revenue, and that, therefore, we ought to have them in Bombay. I will make for it that if he will inquire of any who has gone, not leading merchant, not an officer of Government, but me small trader to any of these places, whether it is Paris or any Indian town, he will find that they look upon these duties an unmitigated nuisance and a great interruption to trade. But as I said these duties which we shall be saked to reimpose when the comes to be read a second time. man hardly be classed on Town Duties proper, and it would be quite possible, as in the case of opium, to put very heavy taxes upon every chest that into Bombay without in the least interfering with the general trade. I would, therefore, wish the honorable member to consider before he brings the before na again that it provides for almost every form of taxation which possible. We will take the article, cotton, which stands alone. Any tax cotton might possibly be a sort of toll, like that which is collected for the of the Pinirapole. It may be collected almost imperceptibly, but I would remind my honorable friend that that will not get over any opposition to a tax upon cotton. However small may be the additional burden you put upon it, it not fail to be felt, and the example of the Americans at this moment is very striking. No matter how great the temptation may be to put I tax upon I great staple of export, we should resist the temptation, and tax cotton m lightly m possible. There are gentlemen whose opinions entitled to the highest consideration who do not agree with ... in this matter, but if the honorable gentleman will remember how much the smallest impost is multiplied. I think he will agree with me that cotton ought not to be weighted with any impost further than we can help. Then we come to the second class of imposts which are represented by taxes on opium, wines, and spirits, and tobacco. As far as additional taxes on those articles go. I agree with my honorable friend, Mr. Erskine, that there no objection to weight them heavily they can bear without increasing the risk of anuggling, but as pointed out, neither opium, wines and spirits, nor tobacco, have any additional weight put upon them by any action of ours. We must refer to the Government of India to get their leave to impose any tax on these articles for Municipal purposes. Then comes the article metals, which may be taken another representative article. It may be said that metals, especially copper, brass, zinc, and on, am articles of luxury and that in taxing them, you tax a taxable luxury. But if you extend it to iron, you put a tax upon and of the great necessities of the country, and I think, instead of putting additional tax upon iron, though it might well bear it, and though it might appear very imperceptible, my honorable friend would be rather putting additional weight upon the future interests and improvement of the country, which he would regret if he could see its extent. Then come to piece goods. Here, again, I do not think we me proceed to impose any taxation our judgment. We must refer in this case also to the Government of India, and I would remind my honorable friend that he could not nelect any article which would be surely productive of deputations to the Secretary of State for the disallowing of this Bill than piece goods. We next to which, with ghee, may be taken as representing two luxuries that may be taxed without touching any but those who can afford to pay additional taxation. That may be my honorable friend's view. And I must say these two articles appear to the most tolerable of the articles which he proposes to include in his schedule; but as regards ghee especially. I cannot help thinking that he goes considerably below those whom he would wish to tax, and that he would, to a considerable extent, be taxing the poor if he put a tax upon ghee, that is, any tax which would very much affect its price. Then come to coals, which I would class with metals as among those things which are easy of taxation and on which a productive tax may be levied, but which I should be very sorry to levied though the tax should bear a proportion to the price, I should be very sorry to see a tax levied on coal beyond what is imperatively necessary. In regard to the last of the articles the list, timber, I would point out to him that of great said in Bombay is additional house-room. He knows how much the expense of ordinary native houses consists of the expenses of timber and if you tax timber and iron you will be putting a very heavy burden any building which might go to increase the house modation of the place. From what I have said the honorable member will gather that, with the exception of opium, wines, spirits and tobacco-if could get leave to tax them-and, in cleaser degree, I think very strong objections would be stated to the articles he proposes to tax, In form or another, I think, before this comes before us again, the honorable member should let mesee clearly what kind of taxation he proposes as to its incidence. Supposing he has made out his me that fixed property has been sufficiently taxed, does he propose to tax those who live mu the interest of their capital on by the profits of their trade? Does he propose to make his tax a transit duty or a consumption duty. I think he should put his Bill in such shape to let us see our way clearly as to what is his object, because the mere object of getting a further amount of

will always be met by the answer-"You can raise the of your present taxes." There is one which I ought to allude to, and it strikes we the real road out of the difficulties which the Municipality finds itself in. An income tax is _____ popular tax, but there is none of the arguments which can be stated behalf of these Town Duties which will not apply with much greater effect to any form of income tax. I bear in mind what the honorable member said in regard to the License Duties. License Duties after all a very imperfect and insufficient form of income tax, but after the honorable member has proved his that a larger amount of additional taxation is wanted, after he has proved his that you cannot increase the present tax upon fixed property on any other tax the Municipality has at its disposal, he will still have to answer the argument that the income tax is the proper remedy for the deficiency—that a tax which would apply to the profits of trade and incomes above a certain amount so me to leave the wages of the day labourer and of the poorer classes of artizans exempt, is the proper remedy for any deficiency which may exist. I am quite man that the honorable member may justly tell me I have exceeded the limits of reasonable advice in suggesting to substitute for his Bill; but as we shall me have some weeks consider the matter, I trust the subject will be well considered by the members and the Bench, who I me hardly believe will be deliberately unanimous in recommending the re-imposition, of Town Duties. I hope that me these points will be considered by the honorable member when he brings up the Bill for the second reading.

III EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE (the Chancellor ,) II the First Convocation for conferring Degrees, delivered the following address;—

Wice-Chancellors and Gentlemen of the Senate,—I am it is a subject of very sincere regret to the Senate and to every one here present that this meeting could not be presided by the great statesman who has lately left these shores: to one whose heart full of sympathy with everything connected with the welfare of India—who loved India with large and generous heart as Sir George Clerk did, the present would have been an occasion of no ordinary interest. But while I regret he is not here among to-day, I cannot but feel grateful to Mr. Vice-Chancellor, for the arrangements he so considerately made, which have enabled to be present.

I cannot help going back in memory to the occasion shortly my arrival in this country, when I met Messra. Bell and Henderson,† who had then just landed, the two first of the highly

[†] Excellency The Right Hon'ble Robert Grant, G. C. H., the annual exhibition Exhibition Rephinstone Institution, on Wednesday the 17th January 1888, spoke Professors Henderson and Bell as follows;—

He help offering a tribute commandation to dentlemen whose scholars in Institution had made the so admired. The seal, the diligence, the ability, acquirements, conciliatory management. Henderson and Bell were doubtless causes of the prosperity of the seminary. The exertions of those gentlemen educated teachers who selected by Mr. Elphinstone to mence his great system for the education of the youth of this presidency. I recollect, too, when Dr. Harkness your present Dean of the Faculty of Arts, arrived here with Professor Orlebar in 1885, the first Professors of the then infant College. Looking to the great difficulties with which they to contend, I think we cannot but be surprised at the rapid growth of the educational system in this presidency.

I find that the first Charter of this University was granted the 18th July 1857. It was a time of darkness and discouragement, when all of us thinking much more of immediate of material defence than of the more peaceful subjects connected with education. It has always seemed to mone of the almost sublime characteristics of that period, that when were all absorbed in measures relating mainly to the immediate defence and security of the country, men were found who made time to calmly and deliberately carry out the measures connected with the grant of a charter to infant University. I find that in October 1859. the first matriculation examination was held, when candidates presented themselves. Of these only passed. The passed. small proportion succeeding be fresh in the recollection of all who took in interest in the University at that period. It found that a great number of the candidates who would have been well qualified for admission if judged simply by the progress they had made in those branches of learning which to be the subjects of their University studies, were yet deficient in complete and scholarlike knowledge of their men mother tongue. I for one, while regretting the disappointment entsiled a many anxious who wallarging the boundaries and conducting the triumphs of in Europe, they had devoted themselves to the diligent and laborious instruction of youth in its rudimental departments. Happy was it to find how well already their labours had succeeded; but, in admiring the results, let us forget alther author. It teachers had good reason as they madoubtedly, to be proud of their pupils, was at least equally underlable the pupils had good reason proud teachers.

zealous student, cannot regret the decision which the examiners of that period arrived, that a knowledge of the student's own vernacular language should be required indispensable in any was who applies for admission to this University. It is, I convinced, are great security for the future prosperity well utility of the University.

Of the 22 students matriculated in 1859, 15 presented themselves in 1861 m candidates for the First Examination in Arts: of whom 7 passed; and 6 of these 7 presented themselves m the final examination for the Bachelor of Arts degree in the present year-Of these spassed, two in the First Division and two in the Second.*

It is a circumstance worthy of note, and highly creditable to the successful candidates, that they have all intimated their intention of going up to the examination for the Master of Artsdegree.

In all the old European Universities I believe the Begree of Master of Arts is conferred without examination. Bachelors of a certain standing; but it is not so in this University. Here the degree of Master of Arts is only granted after an examination of a very high standard, similar to that required for honors in other Universities, and it is much to the credit of these young men that they should voluntarily offer themselves to undergo such a ordeal. I would only offer them this and word of advice, that they should not attempt to grasp their academical honors by hurrying through their studies for the examination. The honour they will attain a substantial and permanent, and well worthy of being sought by patient and laborious study.

What I have said relates solely to the graduates in Arts. As regards the graduates in Medicine,† I find many circumstances of peculiar interest. This is the first time that the Grant Medical College has surrendered its privilege of conferring diplomas in the University, and that the College duty of testing the attainments students has mered in the examination for a University degree. I would beg the successful candidates to bear in the greater responsibilities well the higher honors which devolve on them by this change. They go forth to the world with the stamp, not of a school, but of a University; while they will find their abilities and industry tasked to the utmost to maintain the reputation of the school of Medicine in which they have been educated, and which boasts among its professors and graduates some gentlemen members of this Senate, who second to min in their noble profession in professional reputation and scientific attainment. I trust that the young licentiates will not rest tent with the lowest degree, but will aspire to the higher degree of Doctor, which me only be attained by laborious practical well as theoretical study, and which will justly confer - them the highest honors the University can bestow.

While I cannot but congratulate the Senate on the great and rapid progress which the University has already made, I would venture to remind every connected with it that shall have m hard struggle to maintain a generous rivalry with the sister Universities of the other Presidencies. At an examination which took place shortly before I left Calcutta I me informed that nearly 1,100 candidates had presented themselves at the examination for matriculation, and the greatest enthusiasm appears to prevail on the subject of University education in Calcutta. The range of University studies there, too, is much wider than it is here. I am only hope that we may here make up in depth for what is wanting in expanse, and that when the time arrives for comparison, we may be found inferior to no University in India in thorough scholarship in all those branches which we profess to teach. And I would venture to express a hope that mattempt will be made to lower the University standard in any respect.

And Mr. Vice-Chancellor, while congratulating the Senate the successful result of this first examination for University De-I am I only speak the sentiments of every member of the University present in offering the tribute of the I thanks of the Senate to highly respected Dean of Faculty of Arts,

When it became known to numerous pupits of Dr. John he intended retire from the Principalship of Elphinatone College and proceed to his native land, a general desire prevailed amongst the students and ex-students of the Elphinatone College to present him with a testimonial and have some memorial of him in connection with man of the educational establishments in Bombay. It manimously resolved that a subscription be perpetuate the name of Dr. Harkness for his labors in the Native tion in this Presidency; and that the form of the testimonials be a Bust, an Address, and a lithograph likeness of Dr. Harkness, and purse made remaining subscriptions. In this movement, the several Native friends and admirers

Dr. readily liberally seconded contents of his pupils.

Accordingly, maseting the students and ex-students of the Elphinstone College at the Elphinstone High on 10th May 1862, when our much esteemed townsman Dr. Bhan Daji presented address to Dr. John On 27th November 1862, the Committee of the Harkness Testimonial transmitted worthy Doctor, the sum of Expect 12,000, which hamble purse voted him by pupils. A Marble Dr. Harkness of the amount of nearly already arrived here and is placed in the Framji Kavasji Institute, near that of late Hon'ble Mountstuart Elphinstone, who selected him for Elphinstone Professorship the recommendation of the venerable James of the Edinburgh University.

A learned writer in the Bombay Quarterly Beview and observes respecting Dr. Harkness'

"It now nearly twenty [seven] years that this able man has been connected with education in this Presidency. He has seen the Elphinstone Institution rise now a comparatively small school to w flourishing collegiate establishment; has the proud satisfaction of feeling that, unattracted by the meretricious displays of equally ardent but im judicious labourers in the same field, he has ever kept on the even tenor of his way, seeking for no applause but that of his own conscience, asking in no reward but immand feeling of gratification which results from immandated with performed".

Dr. Harkness left the shores of Rombay on the May 1862, aniversal regret. It has placed the youth of the presidency under lasting gratitude, this name is cherished and revered in every native home having the slightest pretensions. University established in its maturity, and promising, I trust, take its place amongst the great Universities of the British Empire.

I would, in conclusion, say = few wirds to you who have this day graduated, and me about to quit this University for the active pursuits of life. I would beg of you to recollect that you -longer pupils of any single school, but graduates of a University. Your standard must henceforth be, not that of your masters, or of the Government to whose service some of you may devote yourselves, but of the whole educated world. You have the character of this University to maintain. Wherever the studies of this University known and appreciated, you have to establish its reputation, and I trust you will help to remove from the learned men of India the common reproach that we mow compelled to seek professors in every branch of learning, even in the ancient classical languages of your country, on the banks of the Rhine or the Seine, the Isis or the Forth.

But while I trust that may henceforward look for profound scholars among the educated Hindus and Parsees, I trust that of your great objects will always be to enrich your own vernacular literature with the learning which you acquire in this University. Remember, I pray you, that what is here taught is a sacred trust confided to you for the benefit of your countrymen. The learning which me here be imparted to m few hundreds, or most to m few thousands, of scholars, must by you be made available through your own vernacular tongues to the many millions of Hindustan. The great majority of your countrymen and only learn through the language which is taught them at their mother's knee, and it must be through such language mainly that you me impart to them all that you would communicate of European learning and science.

Remember too, that not only the character of the University, but the character of your whole people, is to great extent in your hands. You have two classes of objectors to meet. One is to be found chiefly among Europeans, not, I trust, among those who have lived long in this country, but among those who are not practially familiar with your countrymen, in to deserve your earnest exertions to _____ it. They will tell you that the oriental intellect is ____ out; that it may possess great capacity to receive and retain knowledge, but it has no power to analyse combine; that it is no longer capable of producing those results of a high order of intellect of which your ancient literature contains such abundant evidence. I trust that connected with the Senate of this University, or who is really able to judge what native intellect is now capable of, will endorse this opinion; but yet you well know it is widely prevalent, and it rests with you to disprove it.

Again, you will find among members of your own communities a widespread and deep-rooted conviction that 'an education such mu you have received, tends to sap foundation of social morality, that it tends to make you presumptuous and self-sufficient despisers of parental and all other authority.

The conduct which will be the best answer to both classes of objectors is shadowed forth in a superstition almost universally prevalent in the wild mountains of Germany and Scandinavia well in every nation in the East. The Legend runs of a magic mirror in which may be imaged I things of the visible or invisible world, but the secrets which are there revealed not visible to every enquirer; they are not to be seen by the Seer himself, they are only visible to the eyes of a simple teachable innocent child. It always seemed to me that this old and prevalent superstition shadowed forth a great truth applicable to knowledge of every kind: you will find it taught by the philosophers of Greece, of Persia, and of China-in your own Shasters - well - by the example of all the great intellects of Modern Europe. It is this-that if you would seek the knowledge of Newton - Bacon, - hope to wield the intellectual weapons of Locke, you must learn in their spirit, lowly and reverently with a pure well with a humble and teachable heart. Remember the great University truth, that Arts rest Morals, and that if you would be wise and learned, the pure heart is as necessary to the successful pursuit of Science and Art = the high and unclouded intellect.

THE CHANCELLOR'S

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE (Chancellor,) the SECOND CONVOCATION for conferring DEGREES, delivered the following address:—

Vice-Chancellors and Members of the Senate; —I am glad he able to meet the Senate in this their second Convocation, and again to congratulate them on the progress which the University has made during the past year.

I find that of 148 candidates who presented themselves at the Matriculation examination, passed, which is a far larger proportion than last year, when only 30 passed out of 184 candidates.

I am glad to see no less than twenty Parsees among successful candidates, but I must remind them that they am still fewer in proportion than their Hindu fellow students, and that we must have more Parsi candidates and they must be more successful before they can make good their claim a suppreciation of the benefits of this University. I am glad to congratulate the Directors of the Bombay Proprietary School? at the appearance of their first ful students at the Matriculation examination, but here I must qualify my congratulations by again reminding them that much more is justly expected of them than they have yet effected. The constitution of their school presents many admirable features, it numbers among its students the sons of some of the richest and make respectable Parsi Gentlemen. It is I believe entirely self-supporting, and the proprietors, with it appears me, very sound judgment, retain entire management in their own hands. We might justly expect from such a school, if not the largest numbers, certainly the largest proportion of candidates for admission to III University, and of competitors for University honors, and I trust that the young student who has not appeared among us will be but the first of many of Parsi worthies who will vindicate by their career this University their aspiration to be considered of the most enlightened communities in British India.

In a greater or less degree what I have said of the Bombay Proprietary School applies to all the Schools in the Presidency.

- I find that of the passed III candidates,
- 25 belong to the Elphinstone College.
- 18 to the Poons College.
 - to the Elphinstone Central School.
 - to the Poona College School.
 - 1 to the Bombay Proprietary School.
 - to the Free General Assembly's Institution.

that the schools of the Presidency furnished but thirteen students for Matriculation while the colleges furnished forty-three.

It is evident from this that the teaching resources of the colleges must, to were extent, be diverted from their proper object, from preparing matriculated students for their degree, in order to bring unmatriculated students up to the Matriculation standard. would not have we colleges do less, but I would urge our schools to do more, for they may rest assured that their excellence as schools for imparting a liberal education will be measured in no small degree by the proportion of students they may prepare for Matriculation at the University.

I am glad to congratulate the Poona College on the large number of successful applicants for Matriculation who were prepared at that institution. They are 20 this year against I in the last.

The facilities which the capital of the Deccan possesses for obtaining a liberal education have of late been greatly increased, and I trust that the Brahmins of the Deccan will take advantage of those facilities, and not yield without struggle the palm of intellectual superiority to their brethren of Bombay.

I am glad to find that the Senate is satisfied that there is a marked and steady improvement in every branch of the examinations. A larger proportion of candidates have passed, while the standards of examination have been in no respect relaxed.

15 out of 20 candidates passed their First Examination in Arts.

Candidates out of 6 passed for their B. A. degree.*

In Medicine, 8 out of 13 candidates passed their first examination, and there were 8 candidates, who all passed, one of them with great distinction, for their L. M. degree.†

At the examination, the first that has ever been held, for Honours in Arts, one Bachelor was a candidate, and obtained a high position in the 2nd class. The result of this examination entitles him, at the end of 5 years from his matriculation to the degree of M. A., and I would warmly congratulate Mr. Mahadeva Govind Ranadé on being the first student of this University, indeed of the first in India, who has passed his examination for his degree as M. A.

I would note with pleasure another signal mark of progress. One of the most respected and trusted of our fellow-townsmen has, during the year, devoted the large sum of £ 10,000 to provide suitable building for the Elphinstone College.§ This is not the place for empty compliment, and the act is only one in a series of deeds of public and private benevolence, but I would congratulate Mr. Cownsji Jehangier for being of the first Fellows whose name will appear on what I hope will be a long and honorable roll of the Founders and Benefactors of this University.

Mesers. Khanderšo Chimanrán Bedárkar, Ramehandra Vishau Madgávkar, and Nagandas Tutsidas Márphátiá, and

In 1868 Cowarji Jehanghier Readymoney, Esq., J. I., presented Government with Rupees 1,00,000 towards erecting College Buildings for Elphinstone College, to be called the "Cowarji Jehanghier Buildings." In 1864, account of the rise in the prices of building materials labour, Mr. Cowarji Jehangier added second for Rs. 1,00,000 to his former maniformt donation.

The Senate has also accepted Mr. Mangaldas Nathubhoy's gift of £ 2,000 to endow a travelling fellowship, and I trust the University will not be tardy in furnishing candidates to take advantage of the enlightened liberality of their countryman.

During the year your second Vice-Chancellor resigned the office which he had ably filled from the time when the University was yet in its infancy, feeling that the pressure of his judicial duties did not allow of his devoting me much time and attention me he wished to the affairs of the University, and I am glad of having an opportunity of thus publicly expressing to Sir Joseph Arnould, the high sense which I me sure every Member of the Senate entertains of the value of the services he rendered while he filled the office †

[&]quot;Upto this time two Graduates have availed themselves of this endowment, Mr. Atmuram Sudashiva Jayakar, L. M., who has already passed the competitive minution for a Coromission in H. M's Indian Medical Service, is now an Awistant Surgeon in the Bombay Array. The other Mr. Shripad Pabaji Thakur, B. A., has proceeded to England for qualifying himself for the Indian Civil Sarvice. Respecting this subject, the present Chanceller [Sir William Robert Saymour Vesey Fitzgorald, G. C. S. I., D. C. L.,] at the seventh Convecation of the University, held the 14th January 1863, spoke in follows;—

[&]quot;I see near me a friend and colleague of my own, who himself must feel the grantest pleasure in a portion of that report which refers to a Travelling Fellowship established by him —I mean the Hon'ble Mr. Mangaldas Nathubhoy. It must be a satisfaction to him to find that the first person [Dr. A. S. Jajakar,] who has obtained the Travelling Fellowship which his munificence has established, has distinguished himself by attaining the honor of the Membership of the College — Physicians and the Membership of the College of Surgeous of Loudon, has in open competition obtained admission to the Medical Service of this Government, and is now pursuing those studies [at the Royal Victoria Ho-pitals, Netley,] which will lead him herpafter to a distinguished career."

⁺ Sir Joseph Arnould was Vice-Chancellor from 1860 to 1863. The Nativo Inhabitants of Bombay presented == a-ldr.ss to Sir Joseph on the 28th April 1869, at the High Court. After dwelling on his judicial carrier, it concludes as follows;—

"Your services == President of the Parsi Law Commission will always be remembered with gratitude by that class of the community, who, by your aid and advocacy, have obtained legislative recognition for their special laws of Marriago and Succession."

[&]quot;The admission of natives of this country to a higher and larger share in the administration of public affairs, their elevation to posts of honour and emolument in the State, and in liberal and respectable professions independent of the State,

When I last addressed you I dwelt on the important part which this University seemed to me destined to play the interpreter India of Western thought and Western civilization. I believe that the of those who then heard that I said little on the bearing which the University would have the formation of public servants and through them the administration of public affairs. You will perhaps the the words regarding our English views on the connexion between the English Universities and our English public is and the public affairs which they administer.

And first of all let me remind you that here in India you but imperfectly, and you therefore in judge but imperfectly, of the men who influence our Government at home. You in the soldiers and the sailors whose strong arms and stout hearts enable our writers and thinkers to write and think in peace. You in the active practical men, who throughout our Empire in hundreds of varying professions and pursuits accumulate and distribute wealth, and deal with all that concerns the material prosperity of England; but the chasses you in here form but a small part of our social and political system, and the Englishmen who administer affairs in this country but a portion of the great administrative machine of the English nation. Part, and the most powerful part of that machinery is rarely in here, and can scarcely be sufficiently appreciated in this country. I refer to the great body of in who obtain in their

"Nor we omit refer to your services in the same deducation, more especially in connection with the University of Bombay of which you were for some time Vice-Chancellor. To mark our of your worth as a Judge, of your profound learning and eminent abilities, of your claim upon grateful recollection and commemoration, have resolved that in connection with University Bom' ly, in the organization and of which you have taken so deep interest, a Scholarship be instituted boaring your name. We taken so deep interest, a Scholarship be instituted boaring your name. We that you will accept this but sincere tribute of our regard and respect; and in hope a long career of happiness and encludes in store for you in your native land, we bid you shearty farewell." The Arnoald Scholarship youth the advantages of a liberal education, and of whom a paratively small number even engage directly in what would be called, in this country, the affairs of Government, yet whose influence is most sensibly felt in the administration of public affairs, and has perhaps been more potent than that of any body of man in rendering our country what it is.

Now I need not tell you that an University education may be regarded the highest type, and an University Degree the final stamp, of a liberal education, and I would have the native members and students of the University compare for a moment the impression they have themselves formed of the value and effect of this stamp with the English ideas and the manusubject.

I need not remind you how many of leading and most honored public in England trained at the Universities. No one living in India in this generation is likely to forget that glorious galaxy of cotemporary students, which at ____ University, and one period of its history, gave to India three successive Governors General,* and to England a goodly number of her most eminent Cabinet Ministers. This is a fact which we mun not likely forget, but I would beg you also to bear in mind that along with these distinguished public men hundreds of fellow students, their equals and in some few cases their superiors in academical distinction, who, after leaving the University, entered into almost every of the numerous professions open to educated Englishmen. Some fought me soldiers in India and China and the Crimea; became Lawyers, and Members of Parliament; some of the most distinguished applied themselves to teaching to others the knowledge they had acquired, and devoted themselves to learning, and science, and to the service of God in various ways, while a great proportion betook themselves to the management of their estates, and affairs, their land, their counting-houses and their banks. The fact is, that in England we consider a liberal education, necessary part of the claim of any man to prominent social or political position. It is true that many _____ do, by force of natural ability ___ by other natural and acquired advantages, obtain distinguished positions in society or political ____ without such education, but they are the exceptions, and as __ rule, the only one point which all prominent men, in society and politics, of all classes and opinions, have in common, is their liberal education.

But it may be said a man may be very happy and prosperous, and do great good and possess great influence and enjoyment in life, without whiteral education or indeed, without any education at all. I will not detain you to consider how far this is true in the abstract, nor to account for exceptional instances, which might be adduced to prove it; I can only you that this is not our English view, and that, practical hard-headed money-making as the English are said to be, no man amongst us, as general rule, aspires to political or social eminence without the advantage of liberal education, and what is more, - family long maintains a high position, in the political or social scale, unless its members seek toacquire this advantage. This is a truth which I would wish the cossful morehants and bankers of this island more particularly tolay to heart. If they go to England they will find our leading commercial mon treated - equals by the most exclusive aristocracy in the world, and occupying a position of the highest influence in the administration of public affairs. You will some find out your mistake, if you suppose that this position is due to their wealth. You will find that in England the possession of wealth, panied by that refinement of thought and manner which liberal education alone can give, makes the possessor simply ridiculous, and you will find, if you enquire into the history of particular families, that whereas new born wealth in the hands of liberally educated who rightly value a liberal education for their off-pring, has a tendency to consolidate and perpetuate itself, the most ample fortune entrusted to a who does not possess and deliberately undervalues | liberal education, has | perpetual tendency to waste away, and leave the possessor far worse off than his industrious ancestor who first emerged from poverty by his own exertions.

I would beg the Native Gentlemen of Bombay to bear in mind that what I have told them, is mainly true of liberal education. It is not simply reading and writing, it is not even what is called a good practical education, highly valuable if not indispensable as . much knowledge is to many of the most important classes of the community that I now speak of: ___ amount of mere reading and writing, nor even of purely practical science properly so called, do what I have told you we expect in England from a liberal education. It must be an education which whatever its subject, aims at training and purifying and strengthening the intellect, which seeks not merely to impress on men's memories, knowledge which may be useful and profitable to them, but which sims at training them to correct modes of thinking and reasoning and to fill their intellects with the loftiest and most beautiful results of human thought. I cannot now attempt to discuss the reasons why such training must be useful to the student and profitable to the community of which he is a member; I me only beg you to receive my assurance of the fact, and to ponder over the reasons of it, that we English hold these views and habitually and deliberately act on them. at immense cost of personal labour and even privations; and that it is my deliberate opinion, shared, I feel assured, by every educated Englishman here present, that the adoption of the _____I have indicated - that which Englishmen adopt by long habit, and it were by instinct, affords the best chance of perpetuating that wealth which is me flowing into this community from every side, and of ennobling it by those attributes which in the opinion of civilized Europe can alone give to wealth permanent dignity and permanent influence.

Nor will attempt to point out those branches of liberal learning which appear to most likely to have such a permanent beneficial influence on those who study, not for immediate profit, but with a view to strengthen and elevate their own intellects.

There is, however, me branch for which the facilities have lately been largely increased, and which appears to me important that I would say a few words regarding it, I allude to the study of your own classical languages.

Some discussion has arisen which must, I believe, bear useful fruit regarding the relative merits of the classical languages of this country compared with the vernaculare, as objects of University study. I will not anticipate the results of this discussion. No estimates more highly than I do the importance of vernacular education; has a higher estimate of the capabilities of most of our Indian vernacular languages; no has higher hopes to the space which they may and day fill in the literature of India. But I would remind you that the improvement of any vernacular language, which has but a scanty modern literature of its own, must depend mainly the cultivation of classical languages. However great the natural capabilities of a language, it cannot become suited to the wants of m highly civilised people, except by the cultivation of those languages which already have a classical literature of their own. It the men who learnt, and lectured, and examined in-Latin and Greek, who matured the modern English and German, French -Italian out of the illiterate dialects which served the purposes of our ruder ancestors, and it is only by a similar process that we me hope to the vernacular languages of modern India occupy the position of popular usefulness and permanence. You have now in this University, in the professors of Zend and Sanskrit, unrivalled facilities for the study of your own classical languages. I would beg you who value the usefulness of the University to take good heed that the opportunity does not pass by unimproved.

I would in conclusion say to the graduates and under-graduates of this University that Government will every year look with increasing interest to the results of the University examinations, and I trust that we shall find in the here applied the unserring touchstone by which recognize who are likely to be fit for an impartial share in public offices.

discussion referred to related to missible of excluding all vernacular languages, such missible Marathi, Guserathi, Hindustani, Persian, Sindhi, Canarese, and Portuguese from the oursiculum of the F. E. A. and B.A. examinations, and retaining only Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Hebrew and Arabic instead. THE ADDRESS.

[Bombay, 11th April 1864.]

HIS EXCELLENCE H. B. E. FREEE (the Chancellos,) at the THIRD CONVOCATION for conferring Degrees, delivered the following address:—

Mr. Vice-Chancellor* and Gentlemen of the Senate. It is a matter of sincere gratification to me to find in the report just read, so much meet for congratulating you on the progress made by the University during the past year. The number of Matriculation. (56) is still small - compared with the other Universities, and considering how many of these were prepared at the Colleges which ought to reserve their teaching for students already matriculated, it seems clear that the High Schools me not wet fully adequate to their proper task of supplying the University with students sufficiently grounded and advanced. Some particular schools show marked improvement over last year, especially the Surat High School, which sent up six successful candidates; and I trust that if our finances allow of me giving such a staff as the Director of Public-Instruction (Mr. E. I. Howard,) desires for all High Schools, others will be found to emulate that of Surat. I regret to see admissions this year from the Parm Proprietary School. I told that some improvement has lately taken place in its management, which, it is hoped, will produce metter result hereafter, but I would beg to repeat to the managers of that Institution what I last year, that, - the only entirely self-supported school, as mainly with the children of michest native merchants, should look to the Proprietary School = model to do other High Schools, and I trust the proprietors | not rest content, - they have done hitherto, with providing a merely commercial education for young men whose future position in life demands the liberal education of gentlemen. I am glad to me among Maria A.s. two pupils of the Free General Assembly's Institution. They believe, the B. A.s who have been trained any but Govern-Institutions, the University and Government must equally rejoice and congratulate the institution as such success. I also offer a special welcome to the three Parsi gentlemen who have this year graduated B. A.s. the first, I believe, of their race.* The spell once broken, I feel sure they will not be again left far behind the honorable competition for University distinction. Their friends, of whom they have so many now in England, will tell them that, unless they add to the power of riches the power of knowledge, they cannot hope to stand on a par with the commercial classes of England. - like them to deserve and obtain really influential share of the government of their own country. It is a gratifying circumstance that one of the candidates for the M. A. Degree went up and passed in Sanskrit, and that four of those examined for what would be called at Oxford the "Little-go," passed, I am told, a very creditable examination in Latin. I made particular enquiry as to whether there had been any relaxation of the standard at the examinations this year, and I was glad to be assured that there had not. I trust the University will ever maintain the determination it has hitherto shown, to allow no desire for mearly increase of numbers to tempt her to open her gates to m inferior grade of scholars. As far as I can judge, all the changes made during the past year have rather had a tendency in the opposite direction; and I trust that the Hon'ble Mr. C. J. Erskine, whom I should have been glad to have seen among us to-day, had his health permitted him, will carry from these shores the conviction that the great principle for which he always contended, and which has been so well maintained by his successor (Mr. E. I. Howard) in the office of Director of Public Instruction, is not likely to be departed from id this University.

In any other assembly than I could dwell on I Hberality of those to whom, during the past year, the University been indebted for benefactions, remarkable for their princely amount and for the judicious selection of the conditions which accompany the gift. But I best consult feelings of the benefactors by confining myself to general expression of the gratitude of the University, and to noting one feature which is common, I believe to all the benefactions and that is the simple unostentatious in which the gift has been tendered for the acceptance of the University. The tender was often made through the Government party, perhaps from a traditionary feeling that the Government is a sort of general trustee for all great public funds, partly from a natural difficulty in separating the Government from an institution originally founded and endowed by the Government, and in the success of which the Government takes | lively an interest. But there could not have been more entire absence of any parade or self-seeking. One of the most munificent benefactors of the University has been a gentleman well known to me, indeed, by his high repute as one of the ablest and most successful of great merchants, but personally known to only at a single interview to which I invited him, that I might myself express to him my of the obligations under which he had placed the University. These gifts not legacies, given when no longer himself enjoy the wealth he leaves behind him. They are gifts by men in the full enjoyment of life, and keenly alive to all the pleasures that life and fortune can give, but living among you in a simple unostentations fashion, and setting to the younger members of their community m good an example of steady application to business and unaffected plainness in habitation, dress, and manners, as they will India in the princely munificence of their benefactions. It is the manner and the objects, much than the princely of these benefactions, which makes me sanguine that they may be regarded as indications of the spirit which moved merchant princes of the middle in Europe, and that Arts and Learning may in the commerce of Bombay the same enlightened patronage which has formed permanent glory of Flo-Venice. Two of the foundations are further intended to bear the second of two men whose memory will, I trust, not be sold forgotten in this University. Many of the elder members of the Senate will join me in recognising the fitness of such monutor my valued friend the late Framji Kavasji, man less remarkable for effective support of education, and of every judicious project of native improvement, than for his genuine originality and sturdy independence of character. I dare not trust myself to say I would of the fitness of the tribute paid to Lord Canning. But I believe that the honor thus done memory, under circumstances which render that honor like a verdict of history, will be deeply felt by all Indian and English who love India as he loved her, though they may not be able to devote he did, their lives and their labours to her service.*

I would notice especially the tendency of seem of the foundations to encourage the study of law, for of all studies which, can be appropriately grafted on an University there is probably none which | likely to produce such important results | study of law. A great experiment is, we you all know, we going on in India. In the good of little more than single generation,-within the memory, in fact, of now living,-many nations, each containing millions of people of diverse and religions, have passed under the sway of the Sovereigns of England. Diverse in every other respect, there are this feature to all, that in one nation from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin. there any court of justice such as we have been for centuries. used to in Europe,—that is to say, open and accessible to all men, dependant on man, and professing, however imperfectly, toadminister to all impartial justice according to known body of laws. I do not say that substantial justice and not often practically administered in Native States in a manner which rendered it maccessible to all mit would be in many countries in Europe... In parts of India the private character of the sovereign, orusages which had descended from former ages, gave substantial security for person and property. certainly India in 18th century would never have struck a traveller, as ____ told it ___ in 14th century. In remarkable for the just and equal administration of the law, and I cannot call to mind any single instance in which any nation of modern India could bosst of regular courts. of justice, possessing the characteristics I have described, mopen to all, independent of me external authority, and professing to administer to all alike thown and uniform body of law. Whenever the British Government succeeded to the sovereignty, this defect was one of the first which it strove to remedy. From the very nature of things it often impossible to do than to provide the most just and upright men the Government could obtain, who knew something of the language and people, and leave them to administer justice as best they could, with me other guide than the light of their own conscience and Even this considerable step; because, however imperfect the machinery. the mem employed belonged to mrace which has an almost superstitious veneration for law, and had been trained to guide their conduct by habitual reference either written and authoritative rule and regulation or to well-known and undoubted usage. But the British Government never content with this: considerable province was annexed to the Empire without some attempt being made to introduce some sort of written and systematic code of law and practice within a few years after the province became an integral portion of British India. In many cases, in the Elphinstone Code of 1827, which for many years was the Mofussil law of the Presidency, the system, administered it generally by upright and conscientious men, proved in practice to be well adapted to the transition state of a country where written authoritative law had been long unknown.

[&]quot;Bir Edward Colebrooks thus describes the history of the Siphinstons Code:—
"Upon his accession to the Government would appear to have entertained hope of reducing to a Code the whole Civil Law of the Presidency. Enquiries conducted in various parts of the territory, embracing questions which membedied in valuable reports; but will not surprise those who have followed history such attempts in other countries, which is in the little period allotted to an item!, that so great a work was not accomplished in the brief period allotted to an Governor. Showever, which he was a valuable, with the assistance of a Commission appointed by himself, and composed of two members of the Indian Civil Service amisted by Mr. William Erskine, son-in-law of Sir James

But neither did the British Government rest content with this. Many years under the administration of Lord William Bentinck, to whom India much, commencement made of the gigantic work of drawing up codes of law and procedure for India. The best intellects which England and India could furnish engaged for many years on the task. Some of the most important portions of the Criminal Code and the Procedure Codes have only within the last few years become law. I speak from personal observation of the labour of those employed. Sir Barnes Peacock and Mr. Harrington, the in the respects the greatest English lawyer who ever sat on an Indian Bench, the other vindicating an hereditary title to the fullest knowledge of Indian Law, this moment on their way homeward, were with labours of which the preparation of these codes has been the greatest Mackintone, he framed moode that, in messential particulars, still maintains male place as the basis of the regulations of the Presidency. Much of his time man given the superintendence and revision of man work, which finally became law in the of his retirement from the Government.

The Indian Penal Code originally framed by the Indian Law Commission, which body Lord Macaulay the President; the other members being, Messra J. M. Macleod, G. W. Anderson, P. Millett, C. Cameron, and D. Eliott; and was Earl Aucland, the then Governor General of India in the year 1837. Act was at last passed by the Indian Legislature in 1860 with some important changes, but without any substantial alteration in the framework phraseology original Code, and man into operation on the 1st January 1862.

That eminent Scholar and excellent Critic, late Very Reverend H. Milman, St Pauls, speaks of Macaulay's share in this work in eulogistic terms; "In India he took his seat m Member of the Council and m President the Law Commission. It is been supposed, and indeed asserted, that this legislative mission was barren and without result; now, however, it is bearing its fruits. After much, perhaps inevitable, delay and repeated revisions, the Indian Criminal Code, in the formation of which took leading part, and which had enriched with a valuable explanatory notes, has, with some alterations, and not a betantial, from 1st. January 1862 had the force of law throughout India. Macaulay's share in great work especially notes, by those who have a right to judge on such subjects, to have placed reputation as a jurist foundation. Is the first, and therefore important, a series of operations upon the judicial system of India, which will have a great the seciety in country; and will without influence upon jurisprudence Hagland,"

and the longest continued, and they will, I hope, long be spared to III still further in the completion of the great work of so many of the best years of their lives.* It has been sometimes supposed that these codes man intended. I least destined to deprive you of advantages which you, in all the Presidency cities of India. justly prise, of an administration of English law by trained as our English judges are. I can safely say that nothing me further from the intention of those who framed and passed the codes. believe nothing be further from the probable result. The intention certainly was to do at once, and on evstem, for India. what has been the sim of our great masters of law in England for generations past, to embody our law and practice into written systematic codes, but in every the guiding principles of law and practice intended to be those of English law and practice; and in training are lawyers and judges the model before our legislators has been that body of lawyers which gives to England a constant succession of judges of whom every Englishman is so justly proud. Nor I doubt that the desired result will follow in due time. It is - light task which the English Government before itself to provide laws and suitable tribugals to administer them to so many millions of men; for you must remember that such tribunals the British Government proposes, require not only sjudge to sit on the bench, but strained bar, and a knowledge of the general principles of the law and practice of the tribunsle very widely diffused among the community ... large. It is direction that may hope the University will prove here m valuable Universities have been in every country in Europe, as giving that kind of intellectual and moral training without which the most accurate knowledge of the law will fail to make a good lawyer in our English and of the word.

The Hou'ble Sir Barnes Peacock, Knight, the present learned Chief Justice of the Council of the Governor-General. He was, when Chief Justice, Vice-President of the late Legislative Council of India, from to 1861.

Sir Henry Byng Harington, K. C. S. I., was in 1857, member of the Legislative Council of India, for the North-West Previnces. Afterwards, on the 5th May 1862, Sir C. Maria appointed him a Member of the Supreme Council of India,

On the other hand, I believe that, in the profession of the law, scholars of University find, do their brethren in Europe, a most congenial and useful for their talents improved and stimulated by University training. I hope that many of them will avail themselves of the aid liberally offered them by the benefactors of the University to travel and perthemselves in great practical English schools of law. They will there struck, early travellers from country used to be struck in India, by the spectacle of a whole people among whom the law is paramount. But more than this, they will find themselves welcomed members of brotherhood which is once the most liberal in the admission of members and the most strict in exacting from them such conduct m is consistent with a profession of which law is the exclusive study.

And this brings to note that, during the past during former years, several of the foundations connected with the Univercity have indicated appreciation on the part of the founders of the great advantages of foreign travel as a part of University education. I believe that in every country whose condition in matters of education he likened to that of India in the present day, the thirst for foreign travel has been one of the peculiarities most strongly marked in the educated youth, whose intellect is beginning to be stirred by a consciousness that all knowledge is not comprehended in the teaching of a uingle master, and that it cannot be grasped by who never quits the limits of a hermit's cell. If you look in the picture drawn by mm greatest living poet of him who, from the man liest of classical lore down to the present time, has stood the type of practical experience and wisdom, you will the insatisble passion for travel - for knowledge marked as the one characteristic which age and years could not obliterate - satisfy. At the time when present system of modern European education was yet in its infancy, no scholar dreamt of aspiring to eminence till he had not only acquired by reading all the learning within his reach, but had seen the manners of many in the cities wherein they dwelt, and enercised his own intellect in personal contact with all that he could reach, of the great and wise in other countries.

This passion for foreign travel - gone - increasing smong all the advancing nations of Europe down to the present day. Among under-graduates of our own Universities there are few destined hold high place in academical honours who do not bitually either travel m far and moften as their means will allow without serious interruption of their studies, who look forward to be enabled to travel ____ of the best rewards which can follow ____ temporary pause in the labour of learning. I think - around many for hoping that, in this respect, there is a ment going on in the awakening intellect of Iudia, which, in fact, has marked the dawn of a new and of civilization in every of which we have any record. It may be necessary to wait with patitill the prejudices which prevent the gratification of this most natural and wholesome form of education shall be counted among the things of the past; but it would be minsult to the intellect of India at this period to suppose that many years are elapse before men will think with something like incredulity, that it we ever seriously contemplated to treat as outcastes who had sought to improve their minds by foreign travel. In this as in many other respects the Parsees have shown themselves worthy to lead their fellow countrymen; and scores of your fellow townsmen living and laboring in England, drinking in = they walk the streets their daily avocations, knowledge as valuable in its way as any that they could derive from books, and quite unattainable by any man who man stirs from his man native province. I trust that shall not long be able to count travellers of other mann by units. Every religious and domestic objection which ingenuity could raise has been dissipated, and the educated youth of this part of India must be well aware, that if they would have themselves from the contempt of their fellow scholars in every other civilized country of the universe, they will talk and think of no other obstacle toforeign travel then such as the benefactions lately made to this University for the benefit of poorer scholars intended to. remove.

You have been often reminded the object of a University would be very imperfectly attained if it did not in some sense separate its members from the general crowd of learners around them.

and stand them with a character peculiarly its own. This is in wart of the work of every great place of education, and any versed in social peculiarities of Englishmen tell with some approach certainty which of our great public schools Duiversities any with whom he associates educated, I cannot doubt here = elsewhere similar results must follow similar causes, and I would wish in this, as in every thing else, that you should set the best models before you, and that you who, in time to come, will be looked on as the founders of whatever character the University is to bear, should consider betimes the immense importance of a correct standard in manual as well as in weightier matters. I would urge this with the stronger emphasis and the under-graduates and younger members of the University, because the results must come by an impulse from within. It cannot be impressed, however much it may be modified, by action from without. No grant of study, however elevated, no distinction of separate buildings - peculiar costumes, though all tending to the end, avail much, unless there be among yourselves the spirit to create a standard for your own guidance in 🔳 minor morals distinct from and higher than that of who do not belong to me honoured an institution. You me hardly doubt what I would give to any question to what standard I would prescribe. When mighty Emperor, who a few abort years ago reckoned and of the ablest well and of the most powerful potentates of modern Europe, desired to describe his wish to disman matters with perfect frankness and confidence, he said he wished to discuss them "as a gentleman," and he used English word to express a character not peculiar to any country race, but which sagacious observation had shown him, plays in England a men important part than in any other country in the world. He had there seen that the character may exist apart from riches, from lineage, a from social rank, from learning or from talent, without one other of which it is rarely in other societies. He belowered, too, that it is large proportion of gentlemen in English society, and among those who bear rule people. which renders possible that combination of individual liberty subordination to law which marked characteristic of English society. It is this which enables typical representatives. of almost every influential im mingle freely in me great assembly which is epitome of the English nation. Without visible restraint on any beyond what the cod demands, it allows the proudest and most fastidious to consult for the common good, and on equal terms, with those who in other forms of society it would be almost impossible for them to meet on common ground. As one who has not had the benefit of a university education, I may go a step further and tell you that I believe to Universities, and to the professions, and great public schools which take their tone from the Universities, the general maintenance of sessional standard of what is required of a gentleman, and I trust may in time look to our Indian Universities for a similar service in establishing a common standard of and minor morals which shall be recognized not only by of diverse professions, ranks and interests, but by those whom diversity of faith and race would otherwise keep asunder. I cannot give you a better proof of the high estimate I have had of the capabilities of those natives of India who are trained this University than by speaking to you me capable of bearing the stamp of "gentleman and scholar;" and I cornestly and confidently hope that, rule, it will be borne and deserved by | who claim degrees from the University of Bombay.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FEERE (the Chancellor,) at THE FOURTH CONVOCATION for Conferring Degrees, delivered the following address;—

Mr. Vice-Chargellor* Gentlemen Senate.—Before offering any remark we the proceedings of the past year I would wish to say a few words on the constitution of our own governing body—the Senate. You was that up to the present time there has been no limit to the number of Fellows the minimum limit of fixed by the Act of Incorporation. This is far too small a body if the Fellows are expected to take an active part in the work of the university. Many deductions must be made on account of absence and pre-occupation; and the working residue of a body limited to twenty-air Fellows, which could be present at any one time in Bombay, would be very small indeed. On the other hand, there are obvious disadvantages in throwing the important work of the university, especially that of examinations, on who have no special connection with the university. It is a noteworthy fact that at the first institution of the university much difficulty - found in selecting fit and proper persons to fill the office of Fellows, but - our difficulty is of the opposite character, and me are forced to select from among those who would be eligible and useful - Fellows, and the necessity has become appafor fixing maximum limit to the number of such appointments. The present number on the rolls is 127 Fellows, including those who are Fellows ex-efficio, but a large proportion of whole number I non-resident in Bombay. There are will shortly be I twelve vacancies caused by the death - departure of Fellows. We have thought well not at present to make any great addition the numbers on present roll. I will briefly state, for the formation of the Senate, the claims which were to sentitle the gentlemen selected to their high honour. The Rev. Mr. Beynon a distinguished Canarese scholar, one of the few who is able sist the university in dealing with that great section of the people of this presidency who speak the Canarese tongue. I trust he will remember that me cannot yet boast a single Canarese graduate. Mr. Coke a graduate of Cambridge who has long occupied a prominent and most important post in the educational department of this Government, and I feel assured that, whatever his future pursuits in life, he will always retain a deep interest in the most of education in this country, to which many of the best years of his life have been devoted. Mr. Dhanjibhoy Framji Nassarwanji, has I im assured, turned his special attention to the study of the ancient languages of kis ___ This is a branch of learning in which the University of Bombay ought to excel every other university in the world, and I trust the day is not far distant when may find the Zend and Pelhvic learning of great German scholars at least equalled by that of the Parsees of British India. He is particularly distinguished himself by his energy and fertility of resource."

[†] Mr. T. C. Hope, C. S. was appointed Educational Inspector on the 9th. May 1855, and he resigned in August 1860. "The retirement from the Northern Division of Mr. Hope, who was proposed to the office of Private Secretary to Ilis Excellency (Sir George Enmell Clerk, K. C. B.) the Governor, cannot be passed over here. His name will be inseparably connected with the history of Vernacular education in Guserat. There many gentlemen here who have witnessed the architectural glories of great universities in Europe. It is, I believe, a fact which - should all do well to bear in mind that there is not, so far as I am aware, to be seen in them a single building of any kind erected by the Government, All is the work of private munificence, and _____ to a similar source the promise that this university will one day possess a hall of its own suitable in every way to such a body on this university is destined to bocome. erat, which combines in remarkable a degree so much that reof the civilization of ancient India and so much of the promise of the future. The report which we have just heard read again speaks of steady, assured progress - compared with former years, There we two features in it which seem we especially noteworthy. First, there is the greatly increased area from which matriculated students have been drawn. Not only is the number of such students greater than in former years, but in the enumeration of more than thirty institutions from which students have been drawn I observe the many schools from which no student has before been matriculated. This speaks well for the extended influence of the University, and for the hold it is establishing over our schools the standard of education in this part of India. The other fact which I would notice is that ... find among the graduates this day, and holding a very bonoural le place among them, the first Sindhi scholar (Mr. Chuharmel Kundanmal, B. A.) who been educated at this university." I notice this not merely on account of the great personal interest | shall ever feel in | province where so many years of my life were spent, but because it illustrates, in a very remarkable degree, the influence which institution like this university cannot but exercise over all education down to the most elementary. Probably there is m province in India where there was, previous to the British rule, such an entire absence of education of any kind on in Sind. There were indeed a few traces of the learning of former days. Philologists investigated the language, and discovered that it had man held a high place among the most cultivated and copious dialects of India, and there were yet seminaries of Persian and Arabic learning, but all was of the past. There no public schools, to teach the very elements of learning. Schools, scholars. teachers, professors, had alike to m created. It might be said, and it said by many most educationists, "This is a case where nothing can but to provide elementary schools—schools for primary or popular education, on which in future generations may be grafted schools of a higher character, a colleges." These primary branches of education were not neglected, but it and decided. and I think most wisely decided not to rest content with these first steps in education, but - endeavour to train a few of the most promising scholars to join - the higher institutions for national education which have their in island. We have results of this experiment. The young Sindhi, who has this day taken his degree will return to his own house well instructed branches of secular English education, such as most English gentlemen would desire for their sons, and we may ask what will be the influence he will there be able to exert in the matter of education? 1st, as the higher classes. To judge of what he may do must, I think, has been often suggested by a learned friend of mine, to whom this university so much, and who, I serry think, a shortly beave us - we must, I say, look back to the time when the young scholars of mediaval Europe visited the sour of the great princes and nobles who in those days thought it scarcely less glory to found a college than a kingdom. The history of that period paints to our imagination many picturesque man in which the young and travelled scholar who came laden with the riches of Roman and Grecian learning displayed his treasures before princes and peers, ecclesiastics and warriors, will by translation placed many of the gems of ancient lore within the reach of those who knew but wulgar tongue. May not something of the same kind await him who where days will carry the court of Rajpoot Chiefs or Pathan. of Western learning which he has here acquired ? The Moulvie who repeat the Koran with its . by heart, the who a kiving library of Hindu literature, who had long passed in their own court as miracles of crudition, may, years every civilized country in the Western world has laboured, not wholly in vain, but with at best imperfect success, to give to the mass of the people the first elements of education. It is not the want of money, but the want of human hearts and heads capable of applying that money intelligently to the work of teaching, which so long has kept, and will keep, a large a propertion of the poorer class in every country unable to write or read. Let consider, where in England or in Germany would popular education The it not for those who have themselves been educated at a university, or at schools which take their tone from the university? The landlords, the clergy of all denominations, the schoolmasters, the authors and editors, these classes are surely not unimportant agents in spreading primary or popular education. No man of refined education can stand unmoved the spectacle of a people wholly in darkness. Unless he shut himself up within a barrier of entirely selfish snjoyment, he must go forth and act the part of a teacher, and he will teach with intelligent power a thousand fold greater than can be applied by him who, however zealous in the cause, has himself no more than sperfect knowledge of the bare elements of icarning. These are the reasons why it seems to muthat it is a very superficial view of the effects of this university education to suppose that it is in any way antagonistic to the great man of primary education. On the contrary, I believe that such an education m this university would seal with its approval is the most powerful of levers to move the great of popular ignorance, and that every graduate coing forth from this university will, in one way or another, prove a valuable recruit in that army of teachers which is needed to act effectually me the millions in this country who me still destitute of the first elements of knowledge.

CHANCELOE'S

[Bombay, 6th April 1866.]

HIS EXCELLEGIC SIR H. B. E. FREEZ (the Chancellor,) in the FIFTH CONVOCATION of the University of Bombay for conferring Degrees, delivered the following address;—

Mr. Vice-Chancellor* and Gentlemen of the Senate,-

I believe may congratulate the University that the time has come when it is no longer necessary for any speaking from this Chair to discuss points of merely speculative and theoretical interest, since the actual working of the University and the practical details of its management afford ample grounds for consideration the great meeting of the University when we count up our gains and losses of the by gone year, and review the past with the practical determination that the result shall influence our action for the future.

There appears from the report which has just been read by Registrant to have been a moderate, steady, and satisfactory amount of progress achieved during the year. There has been mincrease in the number of students matriculated. There was 282 candidates, of whom 111 passed this year, against 241 candidates, of whom 109 passed last year. In this respect, the only noticeable feature is the great increase this year in the number passed for matriculation by the Poona High School and the Free General Assembly's Institution, and the large number of Institutions which have lately sent on more successful candidates. This is satisfactory progress when remember how lately Elphinstone College and School almost the only institutions which educated up to the matriculation standard. I am especially glad to welcome two distinguished students of the University the first to take the degree of Bachelor of Laws.* I on a former occasion referred to the great value of the strict and regular study of theoretical law to the educated youth of India, and of the great practical importance to the country of a body of students who should add a sound theoretical knowledge of law to m good general education. I trust the time is not far distant when Government and those who have the task of testing the claims of candidates for admission to the native Bar, and of selecting Judges to sit - the native Bench, will be able to substitute the University stamp of merit and qualification for the present imperfect departmental tests and examinations. I am also glad to the Bhagwandas Purshotamdas Sanskrit scholarship awarded to a worthy candidate. I trust the day is not far distant when we shall find the Parsees of this University devoting to the study of their ancient and sacred languages such attention as their learned Hindu brethren devote to Sanskrit. The two fields of study have much in common. and though we may not hope to recover from the lost treasures of aucient Persian and Assyrian literature any thing approaching in quantity or value to the stores of Sanskrit learning, yet there is enough to be done to fire the ambition of scholars who trace the history of their and and faith back to the early days of Porsis and Assyris.

In speaking of the year's progress I used advisedly the words "moderate and satisfactory;" but I would not have supposed because I no stronger terms that I doubted the progress being quite as great and rapid as is consistent with permanence and healthy growth. Whatever doubt may formerly have been felt on the subject, it is now beyond question that this University has taken deep root among the institutions of Western India, that the rising generation of educated natives is deeply impressed with an enthusiastic desire to obtain the benefits of University education and the honours which the University can bestow; and our danger is now, not that the University should languish as an exotic unfitted for this soil and climate, but that its too luxurant growth should make too rapid a display of flowers and leaves while it fails bring much valuable fruit to perfection. I believe that for some time come, our main difficulty will be to maintain the high standard of University learning, and to discourage all attempts, by lowering that general standard, mincrease immediate and apparent results without corresponding security for the completeness of the work done. And this brings me to notice a discussion in which have lately taken interest regarding the University standards in anplied to Oriental learning. It maintained with great shility by valued Fellows, of whose claims for respect on account of his great and varied learning we cannot speak too highly. that there something defective in our University system, because and did not educate Sanskrit scholars up to the standards of the old Shastrees; and some fear was expressed of a supposed intention to substitute a comparatively easy classical language like Latin for the venerable mother of Indian tongues.*

The to the first objection is that, in the words which I have heard used by learned Vice-Chancellor, the object of this University, as in England, is to establish standard for the education of men—not as mere means of teaching. I trust the two objects not entirely incompatible. I look to this University as great means of arresting the lamentable decline in the knowledge of the ancient languages of India, and I trust that there are pupils of this University who will rival the profound learning of the Shastress of old; but let remember our primary object is deducate men, me honour organizing, almost of creating a genuine study of Sanskrit in Western India. In original investigations late Vedic and Zend antiquity, carried by aide with his teaching, gave him importance among the Pandits and Dasturs. In English bred natives gladly accepted the methods of scientific philology. Among Dr. Hang's pupils were who combine the accumulated knowledge of the Pandit with the critical accumen of the European Philologist. One of these scholars, Maratha Brahmin, in 1863 took University Honours in "Languages" of which one was Sanskrit, the second being English." On the 5th February, the Parsees of Poona followed their example and presented in with an address, a gold watch and chain, in token in their appreciation of his learning and services. And on the 2nd March, he was presented by the Bombay Parsees with a testimonial and substantial purse in token in their gratitude and admiration for him.

In his reply of these addresses, Dr. Hang acknowledged Bartle Frere's patronage to Oriental learning. He said, "I should have been unable tour in Guserat in search Zend, Pehlvi and Sanskrit manuscripts, without the amistance Kacelleney Sir Bartle Frere, who always supported me warmly in literary labors and undertakings, and annetioned suggestions I made for the prumotion of Oriental learning. men fitted for every walk of life in which high education is needed.complete as far a the University can make them in every moral and intellectual faculty-and not to produce prodigies of learning in one particular branch, the especial cultivation of which renders them necessarily defective in general adaptation to the business of the world. So with the study of Latin. No one, I hope, would ever dream of comparing as a language in completeness, in copiousness, an in all that constitutes the perfection of language, with Sanskrit; but while there is a large majority of Indian youth to whom the study of Sanskrit natural m the classical language of their country and mother tongue, there we many for whom it has me special fitness, compared with language like Latin, which has for centuries been the classic language of all the great nations of Europe. There are, I trust, many students in this University who will find in the study of Latin all the benefit that has been experienced by the great students of Europa for the last eighteen centuries; but it is manufact of our object to purchase this benefit by the sacrifice of aught that is fairly due to Sanskrit.

In reviewing our losses and gains during the past year, there is nothing of permanent interest than the fluctuations of the governing body of Fellows. It is mecessity of our position that every year should give us to note the loss of several who at our previous meetings were active and matured members of the University: removed by death, some by the inevitable fluctuations of the public service, m by change of residence. We have sometimes the pleasure, as in the and of my honoured colleague, (the Hon'ble Mr. C. J. Brekine,) to welcome back to the body of resident and active Fellows, those who had taken a prominent share in the labours of the University in its earlier years, and who while absent from among me have borne me honourable and distinguished share in the government of sister institutions in other parts of India. And, in all cases, makes done our best to supply by fresh additions to the number of Fellows losses during the past twelve months; and by adding the names of discreet and learned men, while by their ability, learning and influence to give weight to limit deliberations and action of the Senate, we have hoped to up, as far possible, for the injuries inflicted __ by time. CONFERRING DEGREES, ETC.

When the conferring of Degrees and the reading of the Report by Dr. George Birdwood the Registrar had concluded, Sir Alexander Grant, Bart., M. A., LL.D., Vice-Chancellor of the University read the Address, which man unanimously voted to His Excellency the Chancellor by the Senate;—

HONOURABLE SIR,—Before this Convocation, the last at which your Excellency will preside, is dissolved, we, the Fellows of the University of Bombay, crave permission to approach your Excellency with security expression of our heartfelt gratitude for the many benefits, which the Chancellor and as Head of the Government of Bombay, you have conferred upon this University; and of our great regret that your connection with in these capacities is now soon to terminate.

Nearly five years ago it we your Excellency's first public on arriving here of Governor of Bombay, to preside in this place and to award the first Degrees which were given by this University.

Not only first, but at all subsequent, Convocations, your Excellency has done the honour of presiding. Every Student who has hitherto been deemed by this University worthy of a Degree, whether in Arts, in Law, or in Medicine, has received that Degree, accompanied by appropriate and impressive words, from the hands of the Governor of the Presidency. And annually in your place Chancellor, your Excellency has address us topics connected with our progress and policy. Your Excellency's speeches, delivered on these occasions, are preserved in Calendars, and at trust that they may ever be referred to by an auccessors, as containing some of the most important principles by which their may may guided.

The part thus taken by your Excellency in and proceedings has given this University a peculiar prestige as neither of the Universities of Calcutta or of Madras has been similarly distinguished by its respective Chancellor.

scknowledging the benefits of the lively interest which your Excellency, mour academical head, has thus shown in me welfare, me beg also to thank you, for the equally valuable forbearance which, as Head of the Political Government, you have exhibited towards me

A University like to occupies necessarily a delicate position. Its members all appointed by the Government; it derives all its tresources from the Imperial Treasury; and its acts are all subject to veto from the local administration. Under such circumstances,—especially in India where it is often felt that all else except the Government is uncertain and fluctuating—there cannot but be a tendency for a University is lose caste, as it were, and to the beautiful as a sum office or department of the State.

What is to be apprehended from this tendency is not only a loss of dignity to the University itself, but also a loss of the highest kind of efficiency in working.

For; the mission of a 1 niversity, in a country like this, is nothing else to create an intellectual and vital soul among the people; and there he no question whether mission a likely best to be by persons feeling themselves nominated merely to carry out the views of a Government, he by the free and enthusiastic action of men feeling responsible to themselves for the good or bad success of the University.

It under jealous and centralizing administrations, that a University like tends to lose its liberty. Your Excellency's administration has ever been characterized by the most large liberal sentiments. And these sentiments you have especially manifested towards. You have increased academical body by the admission of persons from almost all sections of the community. You have accorded personal sympathy and public sanction acts. You have encouraged us to settle in our questions falling within our province.

For the faith and trust in us, we beg, Sir, especially to thank you. Knowing the interest you have felt in our welfore and success, we can well imagine the possibility of doubts arising in your Excellency's mind to that policy of strict and severe examinations which we have always adhered to, and by which have kept down the number of our Matriculations and Degrees the small fraction of those exhibited by the sister Universities of Calcutta and Madres. But if such doubts have arisen, your Excellency has never given expression to them. On the contrary, you have again and again approved our course, and have seemed fully to share the belief, that our work if slowly advancing, has a solid foundation; and the it is of more importance create a high standard of scholarship in country, than multiply, ever so much, the number of persons possessing nominal distinctions the While leaving our Examination standards, as an academical matter, be settled academically, your Excellency has failed in your political capacity give high recognition to the value of all the Degrees and Honours conferred by the University. By bestowing many personal distinctions on graduates, by opening them generally appointments in the Revenue Service,* and by assigning to them rank with the Sirdors of the Presidency;† your Excellency's Government has the most efficacious encourage-perseverance in academical studies.

The period of your Excellency's administration is nearly coeval with that of the public existence of this University. During that period the number of our Graduates has arisen from $\mathbb{\text{m}}$ 70, that of our undergraduates from 106 to about 500. The number of our Fellows has been increased from 36 to 175. During the period, by the munificence of eminent citizens, three noble college buildings for affiliated Institutions have been commenced and meanly finished | two splendid donations have been received for the erection of University and Library, which we hope shortly to rising on Esplanade | six endowments in the form of Scholarships and Prizes have been entrusted to us | and handsome gifts in the shape of University Scal and have been received. With the history of all these things the

His Excellency the Governor in Council (Sir Bartle Frere) is anxious sufficient inducament abould be offered to natives who have received a liberal education to enter the public service. Any general and lasting inprovement in the administration of the country must, a great measure, depend upon our scenning the co-operation of this class of man, who are rapidly increasing in number importance." which you have just read, following upon the Registrar's report of ateady and most satisfactory progress which has been observable proceedings of this University during the past m in every preceding year since its foundation. I cannot but feel that you have estimated the share I have personally had in promoting the success of the University and favourably than I deserve, but I prize that estibecause I feel assured that the favourable view you have taken of what I have done while Governor of this Presidency, is founded not on mere personal partiality, but on sympathy with the great objects me all of me have had in view. I have endeavoured more since I man to this Government to promote as far as lay in my power, the efficiency and independence of this University, because I believe that it contains the germ of some of the most valuable gifts which England could bestow upon India. You have spoken of the "forbearance" which as head of the "Political Government," I have exhibited towards the University, and you do me more than justice in inferring that what you term " forbearance" has not been the result of lukewarmness or indifference but of sclear conviction that the Government of this country could hardly commit a greater mistake than by attempting to convert the University into a " mere office - department of the State." I have we felt most strongly the importance of those truths which you have - well expressed in your address, that any loss of dignity or independence in the University involves also a loss of the highest 1 of efficiency. During all the years that I passed in a country I have felt a continually deepening conviction that, whatever absolute power may do to impress any particular image on material with which it works, it cannot many principle of life in institutions or communities, and that the vital force which lives, and grows, and has the germ of further life and further growth. only result from true natural organization, and is infinitely more potent and valuable than any dead image which external power can impress. It has been the object of this Government to draw to the Senate of I University all the independent thought and educated ability which is within me reach, and firmly believe that we worthy to be a Fellow of this University would consent to serve a nominee of Government, bound in any way to prefer the behests of Government to the dictates of his own conscience independent convictions. It is noteworthy circumstance that University stands almost among the great institutions of this country, as managed by the unbought exertions of those who direct its action; and we of the Government attach a double value to whatever it does, because the progress it achieves affords an excellent practical refutation of the doctrine that no good or useful service to the State be expected unless directly paid for in money - money's worth. We have a strong conviction that here, in every part of the world, men will serve their fellow-men truly and laboriously for honor, for love, and for conscience' sake, and we thank you for teaching among other truths that great service may be done the though it and paid for in money. Under these circumstances, Sir, I and my colleagues in this Government have felt that, if forbestance the part of Government is sometimes needful, oftener is forbearance called for on the part of the Senate when the habits and language of the Government may seem to imply = desire to dictate which in reality does not exist. Generous trust forbearance on both sides are needed to insure life and growth in the joint work. You have alluded | realousy which centralising Governments naturally feel regards any independent institutions, main object of which in the cultivation of thought, I say a very few words on the reasons why that Government of British India need entertain metch In almost every other parallel case we know of it has been more boject of the governing nation dependency India conquered possession, and administered for the benefit direct or indirect of the governing power, and, in proportion as spirit animates the action of the government will it have good to dread the independent growth of institutions in this. But England has, in I need not remind you, such purpose, and need have we such fear. From the day when sudden brilliancy of the achievements of her and distant country startled the Parliament and people of England, from days of Clive and Warren Hastings to this hour, there has been a continual protest on the part of those who mould the thought direct the action of the British nation, against the doctrine that India is be administered in any other spirit than = trust from God for the good government of many millions of his creatures; and, however fitfully and imperfectly this purpose may have been carried out, in every generation, grown in strength, and more powerful than at the present moment. However firmly England may resolve that no force west from her the empire of India, the root of that resolve has always been a deep conviction that to surrender that empire would be to betray | high trust. England desires administer India as she would administer her own colonies with a single eye to the benefit of the dependency and with a strong that whatever is truly good for the dependency must benefit the empire at large. To a rule of was kind such a University wyou would form we be nothing but a most valuable auxilisry, training understand and appreciate as well as to promote the great purpose of the ruling power. And even in the short of this University and the schools which furnish its Graduates, I practical proof that this view is the sound As I once before remarked from this chair, I remember the opening of the English High School in Presidency, now, wherever I I I had the best exponents of the policy of the glish Government and the able coadjutors in adjusting policy to peculiarities of the nations of India, among the ranks those educated natives, for increasing whose numbers, raising whose standard of attainments this University I designed. It is not only here in Bombay but from every part of Presidency I receive testimony to this fact. From from Canara, from Kattiawar and Guzerat, and from the furthest parts of the Deccan. I have the concurrent evidence that, wherever progress, whether intellectual material, a observable, there the natives who have received a good English education among most active in the good And it is to me remarkthat this is not observable of Government servants only. is a healthy result of extended education that it has contributed adminution of that craving for Government employ which in former days was almost universal. No close observer can fail to have been struck by the increasing popularity of independent employment of every kind. But I do not find that this has been accompanied by any increase of what we in England would Radicalism. On the contrary, I among the educated natives, who mindependent of Government service, the strongest appreciation of the benefits of British rule. Il is not among the best educated natives that we generally find the warm admirers of native misrule or those who sigh for the restoration of effete dynastics. This is remarkably evident in the native press, which from being generally in the hands of educated natives, writing anonymously, would naturally betray, if it existed, any prevalent spirit of disloylty to the British Government. But I bear willing testimony to the fact that, whatever may be its defects in other respects, the usual spirit of the native press in this Presidency is an of spontaneous respect for and sympathy with the British Government. Individual rulers may be criticised severely, perhaps unjustly, but m regards the Government | large the prevailing tone of the native least a respectful m in England, and its criticism is often expresswith remarkable ability. I would, before concluding once more were emphatically my convictions of the acquidness of policy which has led the University insist a strict and examinations, which by limiting the number of admissions to University, and by raising the tells required for honours. made its growth appear less rapid it otherwise might have been. I am convinced that what has thus been lost in rapidity growth has been gained in soundness and permanence of result, and it is this rigor of selection which has justified the Government in recognizing the University Degrees members of social rank official qualifications. It has every year been a pleasing daty University to acknowledge the munificence of its benefactors. These benefactors have been hitherto almost exclusively citizens of Bombay 1 but I am glad to observe in your report the record of a scholarship founded by the Jam of Nowanaggar, a Kattiawar Chief. This is I trust the precursor of other foundations of local scholarships which will perform for this University the service me has been rendered in earlier days to our English Universities by their local foundations.

In now taking leave of the University of Bombay, it is a satisfaction to to know that I leave behind to colleagues who I believe concur with an in the views I have endeavoured very inadequately to express regarding the work of this University, and the soundness of the foundation which has been laid by yourself and your accomplished predocessors (Messra, C. annual Exhibition for the distribution of prizes and scholar things to the students of the above College took place under the presidency of His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B.

Dr. John Peet the Principal having read the report, Hi Excellency said:—

He was glad after the lapse of several years to visit the Co lege the annual distribution of prizes, and to find unequivous signs of progress in every respect since he am it last.

Reforring to what was stated in the report relative to the dut of conferring Diplomas having been transferred to the University His Excellency pointed out that the position of the College branch of the University was a higher one than when an a Collegit exercised the University function of conferring degrees.

The following account of the second of the Grant Medical College report Dr. Charles Morehead, the First Principal :-

Roman Grant, shortly after he possible deverament of Bombay year 1835, directed attention to the expediency of establishing a Nati Medical School of the Presidency. The subject one in which deep interested; but, for many reasons, it was necessary to enter upon its investigati with much cautious deliberation; and as preliminary it is seemed importance to e courage amongst the for Cofficers the seemed of scientific enquiry as a means calculated to elevate the character of their profession quality for co-operation in this philanthropic design.

Influenced by these considerations, fiir Robert Grant took, advantage opportunity of urging upon the Medical Officers with whom was brought immediately communication, the might result forming Medical Association in connection with the public service.

The College had a large share in the work of making will Univerally in Bombay possible, which was not the was when the College founded. His Excellency dwelt with the evidence—apart from the number of Students—of the extent to which the principles of wound medical education had been diffused among the community at large.

His Excellency instanced the growing desire of all respectable native families to live in roomy and airy houses, which he had the authority of a gentleman well acquainted with native opinion for saying the same of the main why the wealthier native families the initial houses formerly built only for Europeans. This is in itself a remarkable sign of progress. He felt assured that a sound appreciation of the physical blessings of light, space, and pure air, must promote the physical, and through the physical, the moral improvement of those who had formerly confined themselves to close and ill ventilated houses, and in this point of view—though we might suffer inconvenience,—we must rejoice the change.

In this manner the Medical and Physical Society of Bombay took its rise.

Barly in the year 1837, shortly after the Medical Society we become fairly organised, the attention of its Managing Committee was directed by the Government the subject of Native Medical Education.

The records relating to the abolition of former Medical School municated, and the Committee was requested to submit its matured opinion we the expediency instituting a more complete and comprehensive system in Medical Instruction.

At the time a series of queries to proposed by the Government to various Medical Officers of experience and to other functionaries in the several districts of the Presidency. This enquiry had in view to elicit a true statement of the condition of Native Medical practice in the Provinces, and to ascertain by every practicable whether there existed prejudices likely to operate as an obstacle to the introduction of a better system.

ment. Bengal Medical College had been two years in operation, and by its success had triumphantly exposed the fallacy of the visionary opinions and imagined difficulties which but a few years before had led to the abolition of cation at Bombay.

In another way, the education afforded at that College had told in a remarkable manner, we the native community. The true principles of sanstory science wery generally diffused among educated natives; and sanatory reforms, which were utterly impossible owing to ignorance and prejudice a few years ago, were now believed perfectly feasible. In these respects, the Principal and Professors of the College well deserved the gratitude of Government and its subjects. They had assisted to make good Government more easy to carry on well more easily to bear. This, he trusted, would be some compensation for any temporary decrease in the number of educated native youths who looked to medicine - profession. Indeed, considering the large demand for educated young men in all professions, His Excellency wondered that the number who devoted themselves to the medical profession all arge. When the College me first opened, the Principal must recollect the medical profession was literally the only career, except the Government service, open to the educated youths of the native community. We have not only a vastly extended commerce, but Railways Telegraphs, and the Law, many other professions offer careers of these data before him, fir Hobert Grant drew up a most able minute, in which in subject in the Medical Education of the Natives in this Presidency in fully discussed, and in which those principles in hid down and plans in instruction proposed which form the groundwork of the system at present pursued in in School which has been honored with the name of this distinguished Statesman.

profit and distinction. Such being the it is a matter for congratulation that there is erious falling off, either in the numbers, or in the station of the medical students. His Excellency felt assured that when the present demand in other professions is somewhat decreased, educated young of the upper classes of native society would regard the medical profession, it regarded among ourselves,—as among the most honorable of the learned and liberal professions.

His Excellence expressed his extreme gratification at the marked marked with the Vernacular class, which he promised to communicate to Sir George Clerk with whom the suggestion had originated, and who had taken a lively interest in the subject. He promised to enquire regarding the delay in the preparation of the text-books, and referring to the instances of liberality of native gentlemen, acknowledged in the report, His Excellency stated, he had to believe that that day,—the 4th anniversary of the death of Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy who had founded the noble hospital adjoining,—would be signalized by further acts of liberality from the same family. His Excellency concluded by setting before the students, the example of Jamsetji, and still more particularly of Robert Grant, as deserving of their attentive study and imitation.

A public meeting me held in the Town Hall at Bombay, me the 28th July 1888, which the following Resolutions many passed.

I. "That this Meeting, deeply sensible of the greatness the less which this Fresidency has sustained in the lamented death of Sir Robert Grant, G. C. His Excollency then referred to the remarks in the report on the position of the medical profession in Bombay. and said that, while entirely agreeing with Dr. Peet that the position of such profession must mainly depend upon the members of the profession themselves, we should bear in mind that it would be impossible for them to achieve the position we would wish to see them occupy unless the society in which they laboured were itself enlightened sufficiently to appreciate their labours. In every civilised country we find the highly educated medical practitioner occupying a position which is not used due to his learning and science than to his qualifications to fill the post of confidential and trusted friend in every family to which he is admitted a a practitioner, and Free General Assembly's Institution.

Bombay. Ecbruary 1866.

THE annual meeting for the distribution of prizes to the students of the above Institution took place under the presidency of His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B., G. C. S. I.

Prizes having been distributed to the successful pupils and scholars, His Excellency complimented Dr. John Wilson upon the evidences that were before him, that the Institution had grown in usefulness since His Excellency had the pleasure many years ago, of being present at one of the annual meetings held at the institution. He expressed the gratification which Lady Frere and himself felt at what they had seen and heard that evening. A special debt of gratitude und due, in His Excellency's opinion to Dr. Wilson and his colleagues for their labors in system of education which, Dr. Wilson would very well understand, the Government in this country could not undertake. It as field in which he and his colleagues had worked for many years with beneficial results; and it after a glory to which they might properly lay a claim as the teachers and instructors of youth. His Excellency concluded with wishing prosperity to the Free General Assembly's Institution.

The Revd Dr. John Wilson, an behalf of himself and colleagues, tendered thanks to me Excellency for his kind wishes, and for the interest he had shown in the success and progress of the institution. He (Dr. Wilson) could conscientiously say, that after laboring in this country for thirty-seven Free Church Mission Schools, Loona.

[Poons, 3rd July 1862.]

An examination of the English and Vernacular schools belonging to the Free Church Mission was held under the presidency of Excellency Sir H. B. E Frere, K. C. B.

After the Report read by Dr. Murray Mitchell, Excellency said:—

It me quite true that he had had the pleasure of visiting the school more than five and twenty years ago, while it was under the care of his friend Mr. James Mitchell, whom he see glad to see able to bis labors. Great changeshad taken place in that time. The school had at that time contained fifty a mixty pupils; there we five hundred. Then they had but a or two good. English scholars; now they counted them by dozens. Then, ti had the greatest difficulty in persuading natives of any but the lower classes to attend it; now, they educate Brahmans, and the sons of the respectable classes of native society by hundreds. alone he thought a matter of congratulation. No one could have lived in this bountry and become acquainted in any degree with its inhabitants, without forming a high opinion of the intellectual powers of Brahmans of the Decean; and it was desirable that those powers should be cultivated by European instruction. The influence of education in missionary schools in His Excellency's opinion of the best kind, and in some important respects superior to that which government schools afforded. They took in a wider range of study; and instruction in those subjects which we Englishmen most solicitous to teach children from their earliest years, as being of all others the most important and momentous-was carefully given them. He convinced that they had found the right principle of education—that it should be carried on according to the views of parents and pastors, the State interfering as little as possible. The result also a better disposition and moral character than the government schools generally turned out. There was but too much truth in the statement often made that the pupils of government colleges made rather presumptuous and conceited. He remembered hearing the relative merits of the two systems of education discussed shortly before he left Calcutta. It am acknowledged that the government scholars had brought their studies in some branches of science to greater perfection than those trained in the missionary colleges at Calcutta. But gentleman at the head of an important public department had expressed mopinion that whenever he had a clerk who more than usually attentive to his duties, and respectful in his manner, he sare to find, somehow mother, that he came from "Duff's school".

The Rev. James Mitchell thanked I Excellency the Governor for his kindness in attending the examination,

The First Exhibition of the above School took place under the presidency of His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B.

After the Report was read by Mr. G. W. Terry, the Superintendent, His Excellency said: -

He regretted that his recent arrival in Bombay had prevented his personally examining the School of Art; but what the company around them of the works of the pupils, and the facts stated in Mr. Terry's report, were sufficient to show that the intentions of the liberal and benevolent Founder of the Institute have been well carried out by his family and the managing committee. His Excellency had lately had an opportunity of visiting similar institutions at Calcutta and Madras, and while he must frankly tell them that they had still a great deal to do to overtake the Institution founded by Dr. Hunter at Madras he thought the results of comparison with the School of Arts at Calcutta would afford Mr. Terry some consolation and give the managing committee good reason to be satisfied with the exertions of Mr. Terry and his pupils. All that could be expected from the liberal founder had been done by Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy, whose intentions had been so well carried out by the members of his family; but something

Opened in the 8th. September 1857. This School, was a few years nothing more than a Drawing School, but lately changes been made in its organization. In 1864, the Hon'ble Mr. Rastamji Jamsetji Jejeebhoy supplied the fonds for a scheme of art instruction drawn up by the late. Howard, approved by the Committee of the Art school, who undertook superintend execution. The plan was, to bring artists from England skilled in various trades, as metal decoration, pottery and the like, and to them with native apprentices and pupils in Bombay. more than this required to form a good School of Art. First t mecessary that the artistic teaching should be really ficient. Mr. Terry's report showed what was still needed in this respect to provide a qualified staff of teachers; and His Excellency could only say that, - far as depended on Government, any aid would be afforded which the Director of Public Instruction could recommend. The second requisite willing and apt body of pupils. As regarded aptitude, it was only necessary to look around the remains of ancient art we even at the specimens of modern native art in stone or wood carving, and in various manufacture in metal and enamel, in file and textile fabrics, to me how great m taste and natural aptitude the natives have as a body for many branches of ornamental Art. His Excellency did not think that any one who had studied the subject, could doubt that there was a natural capacity in the native mind to avail itself of any amount of teaching which might be offered to it in matters of art; but the number who could avail themselves of such an opportunity of learning, as this school afforded, must of necessity be regulated by the demand which they might find to exist for their labours, after they had been trained and educated. The pupils could not be expected to come to take lessons as a more matter of pleasure or accomplishment, they came in the hope of learning to be artists, who could gain their bread by hard labour at their art, and the number of candidates for instruction must therefore depend an the amount of remuneration which they could look forward to receive for their labours. The question therefore resolved itself into this-What prospect had there pupils of finding employment after they had finished their course of instruction? In this respect His Excellency much ground for encouragement in Bombay. If we look at the history of art in modern Europe, in Geneva, Florence, in Venice, in Holland, and in our own country, we find that next to the ecclesiastical bodies, the best patrons of art the wealthy merchants and ____ of commerce; and looking to what they had already done in Bombay, he could not but hope that the merchants of Bombay would do their duty matterns of local art. They had been hitherto content to depend almost exclusively upon foreign countries for works of art, but His Excellency hoped a time was coming when a should the native merchants of Bombay extending a discriminating patronage to artists instructed instructed institution, and affording the best guarantee for the growth of a school of genuine native art.

[Bombay, 31st March 1863.]

The annual distribution of prizes to the scholars attending the above Institution took place under the presidency of Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B.

After the report was read by Mr. James Burgees the Principal, His Excellency said;—

He could help expressing the very great pleasure he had perienced being present on such an occasion this, and witnessing the marked progress the Institution evidently making. It remembered visiting these achools some years since, with their distinguished founder, his revered friend, the late Jamsetji Jejeebhoy, and he was happy to find how much they had prospered

The origin of this Institution is thus explained by the Hon'ble B. H. Ellis, who presided at the annual exhibition which took place on the 8th, 1869; -

[&]quot;I suppose there is the bere present who is not aware that these schools their origin to the munificence of the late Sir Jamestji, but it may not be in the recollection of all under what circumstances the gift the made. These circumstances are minimized that I was be pardoned for bringing them to your recollection. It is most twenty-seven years since, the occasion of the late in Jamestji Jojechhoy's being kuighted, a number will follow-citizens in Bombay resolved to present him with a testimonial their esteem, regard and admiration. advanced since that time. Considered that very great credit with the management of it. From the examinations that had just been held evident that the Principal and assistants discharged duties with conscientions honesty. He desired Sir Jamsetji - receive of gratification he felt and the interest he took in this noble work. Mr. Burgess, in his report, His Excellency said, eomplained of the want of room, both in school and outside the school; but when the Fort gates being removed will when scholars would be able pass out and m without danger of being run over, he hoped some relief would be obtained, and much advantage received from the opportunity of enjoying recreation exercise with Esplanade. He regarded schools of this kind we want middle and lower classes with peculiar interest. It was from these classes that the muscular minds of a people arose—the class represented by English Stephensons and Arkwrights. He agreed too, with Dr. Wilson, in expressing the hope that this Institution and others of a similar character, may to a certain extent be feeders of our University. He alluded to another very pleasing feature in the Institution—the Girls' Schools, from the future of which he augured the greatest advantages to the rising generation.

His Excellency begged that the President would convey the Dowager Lady Jamsetji, the sentiments he had expressed of the great gratification be experienced on this very interesting occasion.

But in acknowledging the address which percented him, Sir Jamsetji made a reply which I believe is without a parallel the history addresses, for he did not in a usual terms acknowledge with the honour which had been done him, but he mid: 'Gentlemen, I beg in return for the honour you have done me to devote three lakes for the purposes which you have was at the gift accompanying reply, manifecently sided by gifts from the Dowager Lady Avabai and supplemented by the Panchayet, that we owe the establishment of these meet successful schools, and many other in this parts."

The annual distribution of prizes to the scholars attending the above Institution took place under the presidency of Hir Excellency Sir II. B. E. Frere, K. C. B.

After the report was read by Mr. James Burgess the Principal, His Excellency said ;---

Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy and Gentlemen,-I beg to express to you the satisfaction with which I have heard of the great progress, which this Institution has made during the past year, With regard to the new building to which Mr. Burgess has alluded in the report, I think that a very great step has been made in removing the school from the small, building in the Fort, and the very confined premises, in which I saw you last year. That of itself is a great step, but I hope it is only preliminary to obtaining man suitable building-one which is especially adapted for the purposes of schools—in the place, which has been made available for it upon the Esplanade. I feel satisfied, from the manner in which the schools of this Institution are being managed, that the gentleof the Panchayet will not allow any time to be lost in completing the building man as they get possession of the ground, and I trust that, that time will not be long distant. Mr. Burgess has stated that the want of suitable play-ground is much felt. I remember last year, that I noticed that it almost impossible in a crowded city like this, to obtain a piece of ground, which was available for that purpose for the children of even a single school. but I trust that something will be done to obtain one; and if more space is wanted, that they will obtain it in the open area of the Esplanade—an area which I hope, will never be built ____ so completely, m to take up in the space for the recreation of the people of Bombay. The bodily exercise of is a subiect which, I min glad to see, in occupying the attention of the gentlemen of the Panchavet as well as of the boys, who are disposed to take still kindly interest in the matter. From time to time I see very marked evidences of this in the whole Parsi munity, and the example thus set is one which I trust will not be long in being followed by the Hindoos, who, I may say, in this respect, are a little behind their Parai brothren. I hope this will not always be the case: because, however acutely intellectual they may be, they cannot win in the long race unless they add to it the physical muscle which their Parsi brethren possess; but I hope it will not be long ere they me that if you would have a thoroughly sound mind, you must put it into as sound a body as you There many other points in the report to which I should like to allude, as they before for the first time, but at present I am not prepared to discuss them. Some of them relate to the Governmental Department, and I will pay attention to see that thorough justice is done to this Institution. I congratulate the gentlemen of the Panchayet upon having come out into public on this great occasion, and I trust they will not be induced to go back to their old quarters until they get - hall - large as this, and that next year and in all future years they will take a hint from the numbers present, who could not have assembled in the school-room where we met last year. They must remember that we look upon the schools of this Institution on the great schools of the Parsi community, not only from the very striking circumstance that their pupils have been able to matriculate at the University, but also in the very general interest taken by the community in the subject of education. This has been shown by the willingness of those who formerly looked to others for charitable education, but who are now willing to pay according to their more for the excellent education they receive at these schools. When I was last Guzerat I noted one thing which I regarded = extremely hopeful it was that wherever a gentleman of the Panchayet went, he made it his business to visit all the schools and mif he could not make them better and larger. This was especially the was with the Honourable Mr. Rastamji, who would have been here if we would have permitted:-he never went to the make haunts of my race without visiting the schools. Another point is selection that ought be given to the children in their own Vernacular. This is a laudable feature in the Institution, and it strikes me that the gentlemen of the Panchavet will not allow it much longer to be said that Parsi natives are behind the Guserat youth in the knowledge of their vernacular. This has been said; but I may confess, from what I have seen, that it will not be so much longer, for this study will not only give them a better knowledge of their own country. but also a better knowledge of other things. I will not detain you longer; but in future years I hope | classes of the community will respond to any invitation you may send them wouch an occasion, as you did this for the first time, and I trust that the members of the community will be here to see what the Parsi gentlemen of Bombay are doing for the education of their children.

Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy then said:— On behalf of the managers of this Institution, I beg to express our warmest thanks to Your Excellency for your kindness in presiding on the present occasion. Your Excellency has always displayed a lively appreciation of the progress of native education, and this important Institution has invariably commanded a large share of your sympathy and interest. Permit me to convey our acknowledgments of your kindness in honoring us with your presence have this evening.

Sir Jamsetji Jejeebkog Farsi Senevolent

The annual distribution of prises to the scholars attending the above Institution took place under the presidency of Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B., G. C. S. I.

After the report read by Mr. James Scorgie the Acting Principal, His Excellency said:—

He wished to express to Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy and the gentlemen of the Panchayet his sincere thanks behalf of himself, Lady Frere and the company present, for the very great pleasure they had felt in what they had just witnessed, and also for the many benefits derived by the children from schools. III trusted also to have an early opportunity of expressing his thanks to Lady Avabai for the interest she took in the pregress of the institution. He had not had time to study the report. but there many facts stated in it which would prove institution had taken a deep root among the most valuable educational institutions on this side of India. He trusted that it would not long alone, but that similar institutions would be provided for other sections of the community, - that the middle -India might enjoy the same educational advantages in in in install classes in England, for he need not remind them that institutions of this kind the great middle classes of England during nearly two centuries had owed the greater part of the education they received. In the Panchayet, which had charge of these there we the great element of conservative strength which was by a trust—such a see had kept the great free of England in existence during so many centuries. In hoped those gentlemen, from among Parai community who

England would study the institutions of a similar character to this. with a view to prevent its falling into either of two great dangers which beset such institutions. The first of these dangers was that of carrying the system of education in advance of the necessities of the class for whom the institution me intended by its founders, and consequently making the schools, instead of being a benefit to those who needed the good of education, an establishment for the benefit of those who could afford to pay for meducation. He did not however think there much danger of this, while they had such gentlemen at the head of the affairs of the Institution me those composing the Panchavet, and from what he knew of the Parsi community he believed that while its members willing to receive meducation from institution of this kind when they unable to pay for it elsewhere, yet as soon as they found themselves able to pay for I they would do so, and not take up the places of those who were less fortunate than themselves and in need of the benefits of the Institution. The second danger was, that on the other hand of not keeping up the system of education to the requirements of the age by adhering too closely to the intentions of the original founders. In this very city and in their time there had been very striking evidence of how this might happen. He need not tell the gentlemen of the Panchayet that such education they had given to the boys who had that evening displayed their talents to the meeting, a thorough good English education, could only be obtained in Bombay some thirty years ago at small establishment and at a high price, such an education was then only afforded to a few of the upper classes, but the fact that at the present day it me not considered too good for the youth of the middle classes was sufficient evidence of the progress of education was making and of the advanced requirements of the age. One fact mentioned in the report struck him as a very important one and on which they had great reason to congratulate themselves, that the gentlemen in charge of the Girls' schools had been able to get assistants from among the pupils who had been brought up in the Institution. This was very gratifying as they knew that the great difficulty in way of female education in India that of procuring ladies willing to devote their time and talents to the

Sir James James Town and:—Before we close the interesting proceedings of this afternoon, I would wish to express me behalf of the Committee of Management of this Institution their grateful appreciation of interest which His Excellency has always shewn in these schools. I hope that they are fulfilling the purpose which their worthy founder had in view, when he endowed and established them, and it is an encouragement to who are engaged in the important work of carrying on these schools, those in authority giving their countenance, as your Excellency invariably does, to projects which have in view the spread of education amongst the native youth of this place. We are also deeply indebted to Ludy Frere and the Misses Frere for so kindly gracing this meeting with their presence. and we hope that they have been gratified by what they have witnessed to-day, particularly as regards the Girls' schools which and so well attended to m lead us all to indulge the here that the benefits of female education are being recognised by the Parsi community. The Bombay Education Fociety.'

[Bombay, March 1865.]

After the distribution of Prizes to the successful pupils, His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere said:—

He did not think it me necessary to put to m formal vote the resolution which the Rev. Mr. W. K. Fletcher had just proposed. + He felt quite certain that it would meet the views of all the members of the Society and of the committee of management who were present, and they might take it being carried unanimously. The ladies and gentlemen who had done them the honour of being present that evening would see that they had separated the important and more serious business of the institution from the pleasing task of witnessing the performances of the children. The change had been in every respect a most useful one; for he, in with the members of the committee, some weeks ago devoted . Lieut deal of time and attention to the affairs of the Society-with, he hoved, the best results; and he trusted that each succeeding year would show the good effects of what they had then done. With regard - the more important lusiness of the Society, he had only one remark to make, and it was, that he telt quite certain that it would have been much more satisfactory to the gentlemen of the committee if all the public who me interested in these schools—and there wery few who not interested—had favoured them with their presence those Meetings to the sense extent they had done this day. There me nothing which did body me managing body of this Society more good than public countenance and public criticism from those who are not - the management, but are simply subscribers to the Society, or who interested in its welfare by having their children at the schools; and those persons could not do a greater favour or show a greater interest than by attending the public meetings held in connection with them. Having said so much for the serious business, he had only to say, with regard to the more pleasing business of this day, that he felt all the visitors had derived much pleasure from what they had seen and heard-a result which reflected credit upon Mr. Thomas and his Assistants who had charge of the Boys' school, and upon Miss Gower and the teachers of the Girls' School, Revd Mr. Fletcher, than whom no one better able to speak of the schools, had alluded to the improvement in the appearance of the children; and although His Excellency's experience of the schools was not so long - Mr. Fletcher's. still he had witnessed this improvement year after year, and more this year than any other. He hoped that this improvement would be maintained by Miss Gower among all the children under her charge. On behalf of Lady Frere he begged to thank the assembly for the honour they had done to her, and he hoped that me distant day before the hot weather commences, the Society would permit her Ladyship to provide the children with a little entertainment.

A public meeting held in the Town Hall take measures for founding a Classical and Commercial school in Bombay for Christian children of all denominations, under the presidency of Excellency Sir H. B. Frare, K. C. B., G. C. S. I.

III Excellency addressed as follows ;--

Gentlemen,—Before calling upon those gentlemen who have taken the lead in this matter to what they have to say this afternoon, I think it as well to tell you that I have come here to-day—as I have no doubt most of you have done,—rather to learn what it proposed should do, than to attempt to dictate the course that should be undertaken. You are doubtless every of you well of the great need which, hope, will in some be supplied from to-day. It is a want which I believe is quite peculiar to Bombay, for you will be told that in the other Presidencies there are only large and flourishing schools in existence, but there are very ample endowments for the instruction of the classes of children for whose education we propose provide this day. At Calcutta there is the noble foundation of the Martiniere, which, to great extent, educates a very large number of children of the upper classes, who are born in India. There also

[&]quot;La Martiniere College man founded by Claude Martin, a native ill Lyons in France, and a Major-General in the service ill His Majorty, ill King ill Oude. Paul's School; Doveton College. 6 of which educate upto the standard that it hoped proposed school will do. Here in Bombay there were, as you all know, provided by private enterprise for giving wery fair education, by whose achools more or less pretensions to affording what classical education and amongst the schools may be mentioned those of Mr. Boswell and Mr. Mainwaring. We may continually find inof men, who partly at these private schools, and partly by what they learn for themselves afterwards, obtain a very excellent education, and who not only become excellent members of the community but highly distinguished But m you must aware, these private educational institutions - one by one obliged to be closed, times through the death of the master, those who assisted him, and from other causes; and sometimes—perhaps oftenowing to the _____ increase in the price of living in this Presidency. All the schools must thus closed. I believe I mot overstating the subject when I say that within the bounds of this Presidency there is no who can give a better education than such m is afforded by the better class of what are called foundations for charity boys in England. Now, how few of the Europeans here who wish to give a good education to their sons do so by sending them home, you all well able to judge as I am; and it man for the purpose of meeting the wants of these classes, that the schools. which I hope may be the result of what we may do to-day, mintended; and I think before we go further, it is as well should limit consideration to the education of the children of the upper classes of Europeans in this country, who from one another cannot well send their children to England. I need not tell you I should be the last person to discourage any project for the education of the children of the poorer classes; but their wants are some extent already supplied, and means for still further supplying are in progress. But the upper classes have m such schools for their children, and the pressing want felt by a upper some es who are tied to this country it were, is the interest of good schools for the boys of their community; of a school which would be equivalent to the Grammar School in England or the High School in Scotland, and at which many of the most useful men we have had in this country have been educated. I may mention in passing, how much has already been done by the Roman Catholics in this case, for the education of their and children. They felt the want for themselves, me feel the want for ourselves; they to work to supply it, and they met with such encouragement and assistance the Government could give them. I am happy to say. But nothing that done by the Government was done otherwise than to meet the efforts made by the Roman Catholics themselves. And this brings me to notice another point which we should all remember. It is not, as I understand it, at meant to come to Government and ask them to do the work of the parents and friends of the children in this matter: what the Government and do to aid the work, they will do with all their hearts and souls; but I am quite certain that to ask the Government to do more, would be to ask them to do that which they have intention of undertaking, and which it is the parents' duty to fulfil. And here I may notice one two points connected with what is considered to be the duty of the Government, and respecting which it is well we should clearly understand an another. There are people-and many of them are persons who know India well, and take great interest in it—who say that this oducation is a matter which belongs to the parents alone, and that the Government should take no part in it: that the matter should be left entirely to private enterprise and to what the chi'dren's parents think fit. Now I must say I do not agree in that opinion, and that I do not think it is an opinion which is taken by the people, by the natives of India themselves. I look upon I that the Government I less bound I in the Europeans who come out to this country either in their own service to add to the strength of the Empire by their presence here out of the Government service. I need not tell you - Government are continually reminded they much strength. by those who we out of their service, why those in their vice, and that the Government recognise the fact that it is their duty to make life here m tolerable and m profitable to all those who thus support them, and to assist the people in doing their duty to their children as they would do in Europe. This the clear duty of the Government; and I am quite if you put it to the chiefs of India or to good friends here, the wealthy native gentlemen of this city, we to the ryots who pay we many taxes, they will agree in saying, that it is much the duty of the Government to do what they was to aid parents in educating their children, as it is to provide for the same and the transit of soldiers and for such me belong to the Civil Service. But this fact will not in any way lead us one step beyond that point at which parents can expect external aid towards the education of their children. On the other hand, something has been said to the effect that the Government are a little too apt to look to their duty to the natives in the matter of education, whilst they have been negligent in their duty towards their European subjects. Now I can't admit that there is any real ground for that argument, for I can only say that if any portion of the community would come forward and do what the Government have might to expect them to do in the matter of education, they would find precisely the said given them by the Government that any portion of the native community has hitherto received. In this matter I do not think me too highly estimate the value of sinking minor differences that exist among the Reformed Churches, in order to successfully establish the school, for L believe we have only to look back to what has been done in former days in our own country, to me that this is not only a feasible plan, but the right way to set about doing what we want done; for the great body of schools whose constitution I wish see imitated in the present case, date their origin from the time when men not forgetful of their duties in religion, and when they were not latitudinarian in their religious views. Those schools date from time of the Reformation, and from that day to the present, they have done more for the middle classes of England than any other kind of educational institutions; = those schools, = | need not remind gentlemen who have been educated there, not only children of members of the Established Church of England, but the children of the greater portion of members of the other Reformed Churches, resident in the neighbourhood of schools. And it very seldom you instance where thought necessary by a denominational church to have a school of its own, when there is a good grammar school in the neighbourhood. I trust we shall find it equally possible to have the same of things in this country, upon the basis of the agreement which has been come to by the gentlemen who have brought thereto-day, and that that basis will satisfy us, that without neglecting what most important—namely, the religious instruction of the children, they have settled and agreed upon a common ground of action which all meet together.

The Rev. Dr. Wilson proposed wote of thanks to His Excellency for kindness in taking the chair, and a doing so, said he would just make one observation. (Dr. Wilson) had sometimes been connected with important in which the assistance of the Governor and the Government was required, and such occasions he generally felt make anxiety. But happily, there we need for such anxiety here, because they knew heartiness with which His Excellency had gone into the question.

The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Couch seconded the motion, and expressed his hearty in the undertaking, and wishes for its masses.

His Excellency, in returning thanks for the compliment, said that he might be allowed to say that he felt what personal interest in this movement because it was to an institution of this kind he owed all the learning he had ever had. It is in a grammar school founded in the time of Edward VI., and reformed in the time of Queen Anne by Robert Mason, that he had learned whatever little he did learn school. That school was conducted by Christian minister, who was very strict man in sown way of thinking, but His Excellency believed that in the school they had representatives the Christian denominations. England, and that those representatives drawn from among every of society. When he had the pleasure of calling the school tradeamen, who him back from India—others in the army, the navy; the church, and the bar, and he the gratification of seeing two in Parliament. He could only add that in the school all they looked to what a boy did. If a boy behaved himself like man and tried his best to become a scholar, his schoolfellows thought him honour and did their best for him; but if he was the contrary, and credit to the school, they their best to turn him out. He hoped those brought up in Bombay grammar school would derive profit from their instruction here, and that they would have the pleasure that he found in meeting his old schoolfellows in after life, in whatever rank they might be.

The Bombay Biocesan Board of Education.

[Bombay, 22nd February 1867.]

A MEETING to receive the first report of the above Board held in the Town Hall under the presidency of His Excellency H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B., G. C. S. L.

THE HON'BLE MR. ERSETTER proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman, and said that he had a duty to perform in acknowledging their obligation. Excellency the Governor for presiding this occasion. It was especially incumbent upon the meeting offer their thanks him evening as it must be so difficult to him to find leisure—he ought rather to say make leisure—to comply with their invitation. But he ventured also to think it would be encouraging to His Excellency hereafter to reflect that the meeting which he was able to preside at Bombay whose objects he had been so streamous a promoter—a meeting to draw together all classes of the community for the purpose of securing among our own countrymen the blessings of education.

TEN HON'BLE Mr. JUSTICE GERES, in seconding in resolution, was quite sure that I was one which would require no observations from to being carried. He should therefore content himself with making sew remarks about the subject now before the meeting. It had been objected in one of the newspapers that day with the schools which the Board has founded merely elementary-that they could be classed only as infant schools--and that was not the of schools which were wanted for the rising generation of Europeans in this country. In reply to that he could only say-and he knew he should be borne out by the clergymen under whose immediate supervision the schools were going on—that masters who presided them man quite able to give a superior English education, but that the children who attend the schools were not able merceive more than a purely elementary education. He was happy to say, and Excellency would bear him out—that in the school | Colsha the superintendent for many years in charge of a school in Sind which was supported under the supervision of His Excellency Sir Bartle Frere, and Sir Bartle knew personally the gentleman was quite to impart to the children education equal to anything which European boys up to 14 = 15 years of age receive at home. Of ____ he (Mr. Justice Gibbs) did ___ a classical education, m that me not at present required in this country; but the Board in founding these elementary schools had taken the lowest but also the firmest foundation upon which to a superstructure which would be hereafter capable of providing an education, should it be required, to prepare pupils for the University. He thought this should be known, as | knew that in some quarters it had been said that they had only instituted elementary schools. The subject itself was one of the utmost importance, and he could only say that he had been present at several discussions - this subject, and he that every person in Bombay, from His Excellency downward, and fully impressed with the importance of doing all in his power for the benefit of the rising generation of Bombay.

Excellency, in acknowledging the resolution said:—
Ladies and Gentlemen,—I thank you for the resolution which has been moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Erskine and seconded by the Hon'ble Mr Gibbs; and in so doing I would venture to make a few remarks on the general subject of education. I much here this evening to be a hearer rather than a speaker, in the expectation of learning what has been done by the Diocesan Board; and I am very glad to hear from the report which has been read by

Secretary and from the facts which have been stated by Lord Bishop and the other gentlemen, who had spoken, that so much real progress has been made. There is one point which I fully agree with the Lord Bishop and the Chief Justice, and that is, that any statistical facts which might obtain would give a min imperfect ides of the need of improved means of education among the Europeans of Bombay. There is really no necessity for waiting for those facts. This much is clear to whoever travols much in this Presidency, that there are vast numbers of European children, and children of European descent. who have arrived at an age when they should be attending infant schools. When we come to inquire into this matter infind that there was many parents who do not ostensibly belong to our Church, and that there are many instances where the services of the Church are available while they are not heartily received; but I am quite certain that in cases where those Europeans are parents of children, it seldom or never happens that they will not receive from the hands of our clergymen an education for their children. I fully concur in the opinion expressed by the Chief Justice that we should regard the present state of our educational affairs in Bombay = s famine of education-s famine which should be met by the prompt, and ready, and energetic movement which such emergency requires. Some years ago there were very few Europeans who used to give their children anything more than an elementary education to fit them for the military service; and those occupying a position in the Civil Service who able to pay liberally for the education of their children could not send them elsewhere for this purpose. The superior class of clerks and uncovenanted servants were at that time who would be considered in very easy circumstances, but they had not facilities which the overland route to Europe has opened up to Hence there are a few men of attainments who opened schools in Bombay and who were able to give mexcellent education. Some of these schools were maintained for many years in a most flourishing condition, and forth a number of well-educated young men, who even me this day would be considered to have received a very good middle class education. But things were much changed now, and the change is mainly owing to the enormous influx of Europeans. Those who were in easy circumstances. such as the servants of Government, now find themselves comparatively pinched by having to pay the fees they used to pay for their children's education. A few who are more fortunate mobliged to send their children to England to be educated there; but there has been such m great influx of m class who may be said to have no permanent home in this country-people who come here, not with the deliberate intention, as men did in former years, of spending half their lifetime in India, but who intend to return home in a few years .- that it is impossible for them to obtain for their children similar educational advantages to those which they could obtain for them at home. I should be sorry if anything which I have said should be considered as a plea for relaxing our efforts in favour of education, Indeed, there are strong reasons why there should be . continued public efforts. We should endeasour to persuade countrymen who come here with families, and who intend to remain here for a very short time, to ___ that time in educating their children, and not to allow them to grow up, as they too frequently do now, completely uneducated. Now, I would say a few words with regard to the duties of Government concerning this question. I would not in the least assail the view which the Chief Justice has taken in this matter. I believe, on the contrary, that he has hardly stated m fully as he might have done, the obligations which Lord Canning undertook to explain when he published the minute, in accordance with which the Diocesan Board men constituted. Lord Canning's view and this, that while as a matter of secular education, it was not advisable to make any difference between class and class still the Europeans had pre-eminent claim to the attention of the British Government; -that the British Government of India bound to look to something than the bare educational part of the question :- that it was bound, in the case of soldiers, of mechanics, of sailors, and of all others who me brought out by the British Government to assist in the administration of the sound of this country,—that was bound in the sound of these to make special provision for their education. It - on these grounds that Lord Canning drew up his minute. He proposed that the first overtures should come from those who required assistance for educational purposes; and I think this requirement should be borne in mind by all who interested in the proceedings of this meeting. With regard to every other class, the Government must necessarily take the initiative. It must say,-(as it does in the most of the University, for instance,) "Here is a certain standard up to which you must come." You must remember that the question of religion is entirely set aside,necessarily, I believe, . in all the educational questions of India the subject of religion must necessarily be set aside. = it is in the case of schools which are State-supported in Ireland. But with the European population the case is different. They would not accept-and I would be very sorry to see the Government press upon thom-an education in which they have no part; and it is this which constitutes a difficulty—a difficulty which, I think only requires to be pointed out to be removed. It is necessary, with the children of European parents, that these religious questions should be provided for; and as the Government cannot come forward and order the various sects to adopt one common kind of religious education, it can only say to them, - "You must organise your own system of schools, you must say what you am going to teach,and then state to Government what aid you require." I feel that when this is done-when parents and those interested in these schools come forward and say, -that they have organised a plan of education, and have organised schools, and that such and such branches of learning, joined with religion, to be taught in them,-then I feel confident that the Government of British India will never be wanting in its duty to you, but will give you the public support which you require. Before I conclude I would say a few words concerning the duty of that class to which I myself and many gentlemen present belong-I mean the laity of this city. I do not believe that many of us have any idea of the inadequate number of clergy to the duties required of them. In this particular matter it would be necessary for the clergy to go round and find out among the fluctuating European population-a population which is me in Bombay and in the Mofussil-what is needed for the education of their children; but this is a duty to which the present clergy is absolutely inadequate, and they must be assisted by the laity. And how do we do uty in this manner? How many of us do than subscribe to institutions of this sort? It am only to-day that I happened to be at the Byculla Schools-schools which, if they were properly worked, would provide for the education of so large a number of European children in this city-and I could not help recollecting, that when, last year, the Lord Bishop and so many of the clergymen of Bombay who have taken a life-long interest in this institution were spending day after day in the hope of raising these schools above their present position—there were very few gentlemen certainly not a dozen-who took the trouble to come and give us anything in the shape of advice assistance, or-what am still more valuable-their criticism; and when I asked the clergyman who is now in charge of the Boys' School what aid he got in the way of visiting or assistance from any persons, he confessed to that few of the ladies of Bombay habitually visited the Girls' School, and that he hardly recollected any layman who was a habitual visitor to the Boys' School. Now, this is a matter in which every of me do something to assist. I should be very sorry to see the general direction of the Board taken out of those hands in which it has been placed; but every one of m might constitute himself a lay-helper in the matter, and if he would do something besides subscribing-if he would look up the parents of children whenever he can-if the English laity of Bombay would take this view of their duty, then there will be want of success, and the present grievous reproach which me lies upon would be removed. I am sorry to have detained you so long, but m this is the last opportunity which I shall have of addressing you, I thought it my duty to express my views - this subject, and I beg to return you my thanks for the vote you have just passed.

After the Report was read by Rao Saheb Vishvanath Narayan Mandlik, the Secretary, His Excellency addressed in follows;

He expressed on behalf of himself and Lady Frere, and of the assembled company, the gratification which the proceedings of the evening had afforded them, and he added that he wished especially to state, on behalf of Government, their high appreciation of the spontaneous efforts which had been made by the gentlemen of the Society in promoting female education, and their and of the great progress which had been stready made. His Excellency could not help contrasting what they had witnessed this evening with what he had me nearly twenty-eight years before in what he believed was the first school established for females of the upper classes in Western India. Nothing could be atronger than the contrast between the little band of Brahmint girls, who were taught reading and writing almost by stealth in the verandah of a ruinous old pulace in Poons, and the mow before them, when they saw the children of some of the wealthiest and most intelligent Hindu gentlemen in Bombay assembled in such numbers in that magnificent mansion receive their prizes before the large and influential essemblage then present. But, the chief value of the successful exertions of the Society to be found in the high and pure motives which had actuated those who took the leading part in this important work. They had been moved by me desire to secure approval of Government, for Government necessarily passive in the matter; they had been actuated by desire for popular applause, for they had too often met with apathy, misrepresentation, and active opposition. He believed, they had been ful, mainly owing to the purity of their motive, a single-hearted desire to extend to the daughters of their the same advantages of education which they themselves had enjoyed and so highly valued. Whether | look to the difficulties they have overcome | the progress they have achieved, His Excellency felt assured that Dr. Bhau Daji and his associates had established their title to be onrolled among the real heroes and benefactors of their But while congratulating them on what they had achieved. His Excelleney said he would remind them of the arduous task which still lay before them. They had declared their intention of ondeavouring to secure to the women of India the full benefits of an "European system of education," and looking to what the Society had achieved. His Excellency felt no doubt of their success; but let them ever bear in mind what - European system of Education really meant. It meant not merely reading, writing, and accounts, the simple radiments of instruction, but that the woman should be as completely educated as the ____ The details of that education would of course vary, but the promise the Society had given, involved | pledge not to rest content with the results of their exertions till the women of India were so educated as to be the companions of the educated man. It was late in the day to attempt to answer any objections as to "what was the me of all this trouble." and whether the women were not better without it, No such question could possibly arise in the minds of those men who had themselves received and appreciated a good education. To all others, His Excellency would simply say that it was the fixed and deliberate opinion, not of England only but of all civilized Europe, that no nation, could have a pretence to the character of a civilized nation, in which the were not par with the men, in point of refinement and education. Whether civilized Europe right or wrong in this opinion, His Excellency would not discuss. He would only those among his native friends who had any doubts on the subject, that Europe would always distrust the highest pretensions to civilization, in which this distinctive mark wanting. It would be said that good female education involves great expense. Of this there could be doubt, for the report which had just been read, pointed to the expense as the one great obstacle which remained; but this point which they would find that the greater progress they made, the more would their ideas of the subject expand. At present, a few rupoes seemed a very large and to pay for the instruction of the daughters of even the richer members of society; but His Excellency believed that before long, they would consider no expenditure too great to secure a really sound education for their daughters. His Excellency would appeal to some of the native ladies [the Misses Manakji] and gentlemen near him, who had travelled in Europe, to illustrate what he stated. They would be able to tell their native friends, that not only were the sums which are speut in England on the education of daughters absolutely very large, but that in comparison to the whole family income, they relatively far larger than most native gentlemen would believe possible; and that there was in fact no sacrifice which - ordinary English family of the better claves would not make, to have its children, but especially the daughters of the family, well educated according to their degree in life. After expressing his concurrence with that portion of the report which pointed to the necessity of home instruction through good governosses and educated mothers of families, His Excellency expressed his conviction that the difficulty with regard to means to which the report alluded. would speedily be overcome through the liberality of the native gentlemen of Bombay. In every other respect, they might feel confident of success. His Excellency appealed to Dr. Bhau Daji's autiquarian researches to confirm his assertion, that the noneducation of females was a modern innovation, totally repugnant to the ancient traditions of the Hindus I and he instanced Ahalya Bax Holkar and the present Begam of Bhopal as proving that the native ladies of modern days in in respect inferior to those of ancient days in capacity for filling with distinction the highest and difficult positions in life.

His Excellency then addressed a few words in the Maráthí language to the girls of the Maráthí classes, who was seated near him, expressive of the gratification which their progress had afforded to all present; and, on behalf of Lady Frere, His Excellency said that she hoped, on her return from Europe, that some of the young ladies in these schools would be able to with her in English. In conclusion, His Excellency expressed to the President and Members of the Committee his hope that they would ere long remove from Bombay the reproach to which, he feared, it would be liable that Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen would have difficulty in finding, among her Bombay subjects any Hindu lady of rank, who would be able to converse with Her Majesty in her own language.

After the report read by Rao Saheb Vishvanath Narayan Mandhk, the Secretary, His Excellency said:—

He congratulated the Society on the continued progress evinced by the Secretary's clear and business-like report. Excellency was inclined to think that they had nearly reached the limit of what to be accomplished by their present organization and present means of teaching; and therefore he had heard with peculiar interest will satisfaction that part of the report which alluded to the establishment of a normal school, and the employment of properly qualified female teachers. Without such aid, he sammed the existing of progress could not be maintained, and much improvement was impossible. He referred, for confirmation of his opinion in this respect, to Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji (late a Professor in the Elphinstone College, and Professor of Guzerathi in University College, London), whom he me glad me among them after several years usofully and honorably spent in England and who he felt sure, must be gratified progress made during his absence by the Society of which he had been me of the earliest and most earnest and energetic members.+ Mr. Dadabhai would tell them that, in Eugland, it reckoned quite impossible for any but a woman properly to instruct female children, and that none but a lady in mind and education could be a fitting instructress for girls of the highest class in families where men received a liberal education, such in fact as most of the girls in the schools now before them. His Excellency and plad to see that the Society adopted as their standard of teaching the principle that the ____ of any class must be educated to the ___ extent = the men of the class, and be felt assured that the supporters of the Society would not be content with any lower measure of success in their efforts. He did not participate in the fears expressed in the report as to the result of the sudden and enormous influx of wealth into Bombsy. No doubt such prosperity had in itself a debasing tendency as leading to the pursuit of mere material pleasure and enjoyment.

great proportion of their merchants had shown it they alive the responsibilities which such riches carried with them, and that they was able we make a good man of them, and His Excellency trusted wall a large amount of this wealth would be devoted objects connected with female education. His Excellency then touched me the question of vernacular English education. He it reminded him of the old story of the discussion regarding the two sides of the shield, and that they might well attempt to decide whether the walls and floor of the magnificent house they then in, were meccesary to its completeness than the furniture and ornaments. Their object was to educate the mothers of future generations, and for this purpose a correct knowledge of what emphatically the mother tongue of the pupils, ought to be their first object. This was, as it were, the shell of the building. But as a house with bare walls, floor and roof might contain all that necessary for existence, but would still be a very incommodious residence, so - education could be reckoned complete without knowledge of English - some equally rich and complete foreign language. His Excellency dwelt the value of the study of foreign language in itself a necessary part of education without any reference to the special value of literature. He then adverted the connection of Government with female education. It sometimes alleged that Government ought to do ____ than had hitherto done to promote female education. The gentlemen he addressing well knew that the Government of Bombay had hitherto abstained from active interference with female education, not because they indifferent to the subject, for they regarded it as one of the most important, he might almost say the most important, of all the divisions of secular education, but Government considered that the subject was which properly belonged to, and could only be efficiently superintended by, the educated of the native community, and believed they should do more harm than good by interfering in the matter. But it did not at all follow that the action of Government with regard to education generally would be barren of results, regarded female education. Il was not only useless. but practically impossible, to educate any large body of native above standard of the men in class to which they belong, and Government assured that the first effect of giving a really sound English education to native gentlemen would be that they would not only desirous to have their wives and daughters educated, but that they would feel absolutely aslamed to let them remain in a state inferior to themselves, regards educational advantages. His Excellency considered the result of the Society's labours as a very satisfactory proof of the soundness of the view Government had taken in this matter, and he confidently looked to a further progressive improvement from its labours. His Excellency concluded by saying that he trusted his venerable friend the Lord Bishop of Calcutta would favor them with a few remarks.

The Right Rev. G. E. L. Cotton, the Lord Bishop of Calcutta and Metropolitan of India, His Excellency's request, next made some observations upon the report. Lordship of opinion that female education has reached a higher level Bombay than any other part of India. There girls thoroughly well-educated in Bombay, certainly more than in Calcutta, and Lordship trusted that the Society would and prosper. Suppeared from the report that gentlemen had too much to do with these schools; His Lordship pointed great desirability of woman being instructress of Referring medium of education, His Lordship of opinion, with the Society and with Excellency the Governor, that the Vernacular should foundation, and that they must go on and English to it. The education of females among the native community, aided only by their exertions, was movement highly bonorable, in Lordship's opinion, Bombey.

A DISTRIBUTION of prizes and acholarships to the successful girls attending the schools of the above Society took place in the residence of Bhagwandas Purshotamdas, Esq., in Breach Candy.

Excellency the Governor presided in the occasion.

After the Report was read by Rao Saheb Vishvanath Narayan Mandlik, the Secretary, His Excellency said:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,-This concludes the business of the evening, except the fireworks, which, I dare eay, will not be the least attractive feature of the proceedings, so that little time remains, if you bear with me for a few minutes, to return to Mr. Bhagwandas and other gentlemen thanks for past favors and for the additional pleasure have just enjoyed. During the past week - two Lady Frers and myself have visited several of the educational institutions of this island, especially those for the education of native children only; and I can assure you that nothing can possibly give me greater pleasure than to we the evidences which they afof the interest which is taken by native gentlemen in the of female education. It is not only that they see the number of schools—it is not only that they see the number of scholars, are increasing, but that the girls are getting an education; and it only necessary to look around us wherever we go to see that something more than the school education of the females is makeing progress. There was many things which strike a stranger, but especially an old inhabitant of India, that an matter what part of the country he may visit, he will witness signs of increasing prosperity. It is pleasant to see the proofs of extended promise, and I think I speak the sentiments of all the European ladies gentlemen present, that nothing can possibly give greater pleasure than to see the evidences which meet us on every wide of the increased appreciation of education by the natives of this country. Through you they are being treated as are in the habit of seeing treated was fellow creatures. When and children driving about in the open air, - seeing the native gentlemen taking walk in the country- I may say that there are few things which give mold Indian greater pleasure than this. On one or two former occasions when I had the pleasure of addressing you, I have contented myself with saving to those native gentlemen who do not yet agree with m in these matters, that if they wish to approach to English habits they must first of all agree with me in this important matter. I hope you will bear with me if I tell you that I feel this is a matter of great interest and highly important. All the native gentlemen who here this evening will recollect what a dark cloud came the civilization of the whole world when the civilization of Greece and Rome we overwhelmed by the inroads of barbarians. They carried with them system of barbarism which we scarcely ceive in our day, --unless it is such as the Pindarees give notion of. Well, all the countries of the world have been steeped in a like barbarism. If you read attentively the history of how the world recovered from barbarium you will see that there were two great causes-one, the religion which ... English profess, and the other the spirit of chivalry. The spirit chivalry mothing else than an appreciation of good society. It must this, as every historian will tell you, which had a pre-eminent and marked share during many centuries in rescuing Europe from barbarism and bringing it to its present state of civilization. The work has been done, and we can trace to-day some of its manifestations. There is a doubt that our ancestors regarded the female portion of the community - the great, almost the chief instruments in bringing back civilization to Europe. I wish all my native friends to recollect that this spirit, although it manifested itself chiefly there, me not confined to Europe. If they will read any history of Rajpootana, they will me that this spirit, me a desire to make them - far as possible equal to this. This spirit is essentially the spirit of Hindu spirit which subdued India drove out the barbarous tribes of those days, and formed such communities that they man now, after the duration of many centuries. atill vigorous and still able to oppose to w vital power which in spite of this Government and its forces, can command the respect of all who go among them. Now this is a fact which the rising community of this country should ponder. It is matter, of great importance, too, that the native gentlemen are learning to enjoy the society of the ladies of their families, which - in Europe-and in England especially-look upon as the best reward of our lives; but I would have those gentlemen here who have aspirations for a high political position to believe that those great changes which we all look for caunot be achieved without such experiments as those of this Committee raising the social position of the ladies of this country generally. I trust that this question is fast proceeding out of the region of argument, and that it is going to be accepted by you, as it already is by us, an acknowledged fact; but since we not last year I have come some yery intelligent native gentlemen, and they say, as the result of observation and reflection-"All this is very well for you; but our systems and our ways are different, and we get on much better in the way in which we have hitherto lived-keeping our wives and families apart from ourselves and never letting them see us or join with us in society." I mafraid that porhaps a few genulemen who have enlarged their minds with reading and travel are apt to take views of this kind, and it is needless to ask you to point out the great failacy which underlies all their arguments. If you press and of them he will tell you that, however Europeans, from their habits and constitution, may be able to pay the distinction which is paid to our ladies in this country it would take all spirit and _sanliness out of mankind here. Now I would ask you, especially those gentlemen who have travelled, to explain to those gentlemen what is the general effect evident among ourselves -- what do you find to be the effect of this society upon me of business, or those engaged in the manly business of the world? I think the engaged in the manly business of the world find the greatest interest and the fullest relaxation in the conversation of intelligent of their own class, I recollect great statesman who is no more, once told me what he knew of the Duke of Wellington - this matter. You all know who the Duke was the great Iron Duke as a call him and how strong his wish always - to adapt the public mind to public duty. There is not a higher instance of sternest adhesion to principle mentioned in modern history:-but I asking this gentleman why although there were many points in the Duke's history which and of the greatest interest, he yet never talked about himself. The reply the Duke never talks about himself; if it is of his campaigns he never talks about it; yet to So-and-So-and he mentioned the man of a lady noted for her grace and her accomplishments-except to a lady of this character you can seldom get him to refer to the battles of his early days at all. We have still the evidence of great commercial men, of great lawyers, and of great statesmen, what great assistance they derived from the sympathising spirit of the ladies of their family. I might cite the of the great Lord Canning during the fearful days of the late mutiny. I would refer to Sir Jamerji Jejeebloy and other gentlewho have been in England, who will understand me when I say that if you take away the society of the ladies of Loudon from the of business or statesmen of that city you take away half their powers. I would ask you to look at the cause of this. Now, there is no country in the world where men of business are more intelligent than those of America, and there is - country in the world where more attention is paid to women, m where they are allowed m much liberty where they are so highly educated. I think you will all agree with me that in commerce, - war, or in any other department of life, the Americans are second to none. I would beg the educated members of this community to bear these things in mind, and to recollect that if they would have it increase, not only in wealth and prosperity, but also in political importance, this question of female education is not of ornament but of serious consideration with them, and which they cannot postpone. I trust that the different sections of this community will emulate each other as they are now doing, and that we shall find Parsees and Hindoos trying to outvie each other, and see who will do most for the

It is matter of regret that there are large and wealthy sections of the community who utterly in the background in this respect. I trust we shall not long have it said this is the You must not think it ungracious in me to say so, but in all these respects the Hindres - somewhat behind the Parsees; and all the Parsees have taken the lead, which, I trust, they will long keep and carry on, in teaching their females all that be taught in the schools. will not detain you much longer, but all who have been lately in Bombay will understand when I may that we must unite in giving a sound English education and in getting it from man however accomplished, but from ladies of their own class. This would be an advantage to the Parsi community, but which I regret to say we are still obliged to bring about. I trust it will not be possible to say this another twelve months hence. We have seen in the report, and in the performance of the girls this day ample evidence of the good-will and affection of the Hindu gentlemen who have taken up this question with will and determination to succeed. I hope you will appreciate the force of what I should be sorry to consider a repreach in the remark I me going to make, that with the exception of the Hon'ble Jagannath Sankarsett, this small room contains all the leaders of this movement. This must not be said any longer; you must bring other gentlemen to meet the persons whose manner have been allied to it. I have just heard from Dr. Bhau Daji that we have just received from Mr. Premchand Roychand the offer to give miless a mon than a lac and a half of rupees for the purpose of advancing education in this city.* I hope he will build a good school and have more for a larger meeting than this without trespassing upon the hospitality of Mr. Bhagwandas, and I trust that the noble benefaction will not be the last of this kind in Bombay, but that this large city will not be satisfied with mingle school, we even half a dozen schools, but that each wealthy man in his meighbourhood and in his class will provide for the benefit of the community. And with these remarks I wish to return thanks to the ladies and gentlemen who have advanced the progress of these schools.

The Students' Literary and Seientific Society's Girls' Schools.

Bombay. 27th February 1867.

A DISTRIBUTION of prizes and scholarships to the successful girls attending the schools of the above society took place at the residence of Vinayakrao Jaganuathji Sankarsett, Esq. His Excellency the Governor presided on the occasion.

When the reading of the Report by Rao Saheb Vishvanath Narayan Mandlik, the Secretary, had concluded, Dr. Bháu Dáji, Hon. M. R. A. S., the President of the Society,* read the following Address:---

May it places you a Excellency,—We, the members of the Students' Literary and Scientific Society, beg to tender your Excellency this expression of our heartfelt thanks for the zealous interest your Excellency has taken in promoting the cause of native female education in this Presidency, and of our deep regret at your Excellency's approaching departure from the ——— of your labours amongst us.

Although indigenous to the country, female education had by long neglect become meanly extinct, as to demand for its restoration the cure, the anxiety, and the patronage needful for measure.

We felt that, however pure our cause, and however great interest, could not in the present state of native feeling anticipate the success which has rewarded our exertions, without the countenance and encouragement of those who hold the reins of Government. This encouragement has been fully afforded to us by your Excellency, while the acrive sympathy evinced by Lady Frere in promoting a movement on which the motal elevation of the people of India essentially depends, cannot fail be remembered by without lasting gratitude. The expectations that whad indulged in on behalf of female education from your Excellency's gule this Presidency have been fully realized. We have found your Excellency ready to your best efforts in aiding both the pupils in schools as well ourselves, by presiding at the annual exhibitions and by publicly recognizing humble attempts to ameliorate the condition of the women of India and thus stamping these efforts with your Excellency's approval.

We would also take this opportunity of expressing unfeigned gratitude for your Excellency's active interest in the for your Excellency's active interest in the form of native education generally. That cause so dear to every well-wisher of this great country has repeived no form encouragement by the liberal policy of your Excellency raising educated native gentlemen posts of responsibility and honour, while the blessings of education have been extended to every remote of this Presidency. So general has been the spread of education during your Excellency's administration that the educational institutions of the Presidency have doubled in that period, a fact which speaks for itself.

Deep as is our regret at losing in your Excellency a friend of native education and sincere well-wisher of this country, it is to some extent moderated by the hope that your Excellency will still be able to render important service this country in your exalted position and adviser to Majesty's Secretary of State for India.

As a small tribute of our esteem and regard for your Excellency. In beg to permitted to found a scholarship in your Excellency's name, as well another in that of Lady Frere, in commexion with the Girls' Schools under our management.

We desire, in conclusion, to offer to your Excellency our sincers wishes that your Excellency, Lady Frene, and the members of your family may be blessed with all happiness and prosperity on your retirement to your mative land.

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere replied:-

Mr. President, and Gentlemen,—I beg you will accept, me behalf of yourself and the members of your society, my sincere thanks for the address you have just read. It has been matter of very great satisfaction to me to be able to redeem the promise which I made to you a great many months ago that I would, if possible, meet you again at another annual examination of these schools; and what you have read to to-day in the report has satisfied me notwithstanding the gloomy period through which we have passed, the work which the students of Bombay had - well undertaken, when many of them ---young men, has, by the blessing of God, made both steady and satisfactory progress. You referred in the report which you read. to the deductions which must be made from what, when | last met you in this room, we were able to congratulate you upon. in the measure of success you had attained. I cannot, however, look altogether upon what has happened to your labours - otherwise than a cause of satisfaction. I recollect, when you first began the work of female education in this city, you were obliged to collect scholars from every portion of the native community before you could present yourselves to the public m a body of such influence as to enable you to take the lead in female education. Since that time you have thrown off from the parent body a very healthy off-shoot in the Parsi Girls' schools, which I am very glad to know are prospering under the conduct of gentlemen of that community; and I think you have judged wisely in agreeing to the separation of your labours in making over to the gentlemen of the Guzerathi community those schools which are chiefly frequented by girls from that class of society.* I think you will find that you have enough, and than enough before you, in looking after the schools of the great Marathi community of this capital; and when I remember what you have achieved during the past two years in the face of great discouragements, I feel certain that you - on the way to permanent success. That you have been able to say that there was not actual loss of ground during that period, is in itself m proof of satisfactory progress; and I hope that the time will come when the educated young of the other parts of the Marathi country will join with you in the work that you have in hand. We have lately, in Poona, and in other parts of the presidency, had most satisfactory evidence that there is no backwardness among the chiefs of your nation, and among the nobles of your race, to give you every support in this

[&]quot;The Parsi Girls' Schools were maintained for mann years by the funds of the Students' Literary and Scientific Society, after which their management was transferred to the Parsi Girls' Association, formed on the 28th March 1858. matter in other cities well as in Bombay. Upon the importance of this subject I need not dilate. You began these schools in all the ardour of your early youth when the eldest of you was in truth only a student, but now you are men, taking a part in the management of your families and in the government of this country, and I feel satisfied that every day must strengthen your views of the paramount importance of this branch of education; because it is the education not only of your wives and sisters and daughters but it is to a great extent the education of your as well. I very lately had occasion to refer to a report written by we officer who is well-known to me as one of the best friends of the natives of this country-General Le Grand Jacob. In speaking of the difficulties besetting the administration of Kattiawar, he said that of all the difficulties which he met, there was none so serious to his mind as the almost total absence of good female education among the people of that province. He ascribed, in part, the great blessings which had been brought to this country in the shape of peace and good government, to the deterioration of the nobles of the land by taking from them almost the only stimulus to active exertion which they used to find in their internal dissensions of war, and he said he found that in a great majority of cases the management of many large estates was passing from the hands of young men who from want of education and from want of occupation were daily losing every characteristic of the noble race from which they sprung, into the hands of their wives and mothers, who, being educated, were quite capable of supplying the place which their male relatives ought otherwise to have filled. It is true they were not addicted to such vices m opium eating, from which young men often suffer so much; but on the other hand, from their total want of education and capacity to deal with those who ordinarily undertook the management of their affairs they, their families, and their establishment were all going to ruin. But General Jacob believed that female education-I - speaking of what took place several years ago-was the only thing which would undoubtedly prevent the ruin of most of the great families of that province. I feel assured that the truths which he laid before his superiors at that time, under the seal of his official correspondence, have been more or less present in the work which you have had before you, and that in the discouragements and difficulties you have met with, you have been sustained by the feeling that in educating your young women-though that class may not be a large and numerous one in the great nation to which you belong-you are still doing your best towards a great national service. I thank you very sincerely for what you have said about what Lady Frero and I have been able to do in promoting the great work of female education in this country. You know that it bears a very small proportion to what we would have done if we had had the power: but we carry with us this satisfaction that the work you have underiaken is in a state of daily progress towards that time when I hope you will be able to see not only all the ladies of your own families in the enjoyment of a good education, but that the work will be continued by ladies competent to the task. That, in my opinion, is a great desideratum in the present day. It appears to that many young persons are unavoidably precluded from taking advantage of anything in the shape of a complete education. And it is this which makes their education so short and so imperfect; but I trust that, seeing so many scholars around us, the educated native Hindu gentlemen of Bombay are not going to let this be said against their race, that whilst the education of their daughters is necessarily entrusted to them, it ceases about the time when the education of the young females in my own country becomes most important. I hope that I may meet many of you in my own country, and I feel assured that whether there m here, this subject will be foremost in our minds. I earnestly trust that the blessing of God will go with you in your work, and behalf of myself and Lady Frere I thank you most heartily for the address you have read to us, and for the manner in which you purpose, in the ner most congenial to yourselves, to recognise our notice of the excellent work you have undortaken.

The Parsi Girls' School Association.'

A distribution of prizes to the successful girls attending the schools of the above Association took place at the residence of Byramji Jejeebhoy Esq. His Excellency the Governor presided on the occasion.

Mr. Dossabhoy Framji Karaka, one of the Members of the Managing Committee read the report and concluded it by saying, " the Committee beg to express to your Excellency their warmest thanks for your kindness in honouring them with your presence this day. To Lady Frere also their most sincere thanks - due for her kindness in consenting to present the prizes to the successful pupils. The Committee also feel much indebted to the Misses Frere and the other ladies and gentlemen who have honoured meeting by their presence; they feel that your Excellency in presiding this gathering, and her Ladyship in consenting to present the prizes, not do so a matter of form, but because your Excellency and Ludy Frere take a deep interest in the subject of Native Female Education. If the natives have been aroused to a good of its importance, they have been encouraged to go onward in the knowledge of the righteousness of the cause. and that in your Excellency they have a hearty and deep sympathiger in all their difficulties. Your Excellency has been many years in this country, and it is patent to every who is all acquainted with your career, that you have always laboured for the good of the people. Wherever, in the providence of God you have been called to rule, your Excellency's name has herome a household word,"

He thanked the gentlemen of the Committee for the pleasure which he and the other visitors had received from what they had and heard at this first examination of these schools to which they had been kind enough to invite their European friends. He sincerely trusted that this would not be the last occasion on which they would allow those friends to participate in the pleasure which he was seen the progress of the schools must give to the gentlemen of the direction. The progress of the schools was not merely numerical. They had the satisfaction of knowing that these schools did not depend for their success upon any external agency. but that they were a spontaneous _____ to the wishes of the Parsi community itself. He thought it to this feature in their character that they chiefly owed their success, for he quite certain that the Parsees in conducting these schools must be very unlike what they were in regard to everything else if they rested content with anything but the very best they could get. Not only with respect to numbers, but with regard also to the character of the education afforded by these schools, they had the pleasure of witnessing continuing progress. In what the pupils had done there was a great deal they might wish to see, but he quite agreed that there was much satisfaction to be derived from what had been already achieved. It was quite certain that they could not bring sbout that general improvement which they would like to see till the great body of the Parsi ladies were able to read and write well in their own tongue-able to communicate freely with their friends at a distance, and to amuse their leisure hours by reading. He confident that those who had the management of these schools would not be content with what they had already done, for he agreed in the hope expressed in the report- and expressed in language which it would be difficult to improve—that the time not far distant when by the agency of female teachers wery considerable improvement might be made in the teaching of the schools. He need not remind the gentlemen of the Committee that the young ladies attending the schools necessarily broke off their education just at the very time when education became of the greatest importance. There are great deal to be done in infancy, up to the age of 12 or 14; but the best part of one's education received after that age. It was learned when the mental faculties had been fairly excited and _____ to full maturity, that of most value to the scholars. As the report very well observed, it impossible that instruction of this kind could be imparted any large scale without the aid of female teachers. He was sorry that the report concluded with an expression of regret that their efforts to obtain such teachers had been unavailing, but he very much mistaken the progress which had been made

among the Parmi ladies in regard to education - not tend to supply that want. He would not for one moment have it supposed that money could obtain what they required, for he need not tell them heartily he agreed in the old Eastern opinion, that the teaching of youth was a holy work, not to be undertaken merely for gain. But it was a matter of experience that in no climate and in no age could one person effectively conduct the education of was than a very limited number of boys and girls. Even in imparting the most elementary instruction, when teacher had about eighteen or twenty children the instruction lost a great part of its effect; and mu this account as well as me others the teaching of large numbers of children was very exhausting task, and care should be taken to have the work given to an adequate number of efficient instructors. Now, what good pay for work of this kind? It had been considered that a few rupces a month are large pay for this kind of work; but he thought they would find that a very large sum approaching Rs. 100 150 a month was not too much to pay for the services of single teacher such as the purents present could confidently entrust with the education of their children. He trusted that parents would lay this to their heart and ponder well upon it, and that they would ___ that they could not by mere bidding for them. or without sacrificing a very considerable amount of money, get such teachers as they desired. And surely almost any sacrifice they could make for such mobilect would be a sacrifice well made. He would not detain them longer than by expressing his regret at the absence of Mr. Framji Nusserwanji, whom he would be sure to tell how excellently well the schools were conducted.

The Alexandra Native Girls' English Institution.

The annual distribution of prizes to the successful girls attending the above Institution took place at Franji Hall, Breach-Uandy. His Excellency the Governor presided on the occasion.

When the distribution of prizes had concluded, Excellency waid;—

Ladies and Gentlemen: - I should be very sorry indeed if to be supposed that the expression of feeling as to what we have and this day, matter of form: for I do not wall any stranger coming here and seeing what have me of these children, could fail to carry away the memory—even if he did not care for India, as I am most of m do care—of these proceedings, and to hold that memory for life time. But to who are older inhabitants, what have seen in Framji's Hall is of the greatest interest, because it speaks so forcibly of the great truths inculcated in the minds of his children by my old friend, the late Mr. Framji Kavasji, and of the corvices rendered by him in this matter, ... well ... of the services of Mr. Manockii Cursetii, which are beginning bear most valuable fruit. I was there is not of the Parsi community. who was remember Mr. Framji Kavasji,† who will not feel a deep personal interest in all that we have were here to-day, and at the time it is very gratifying to those who witnessed the examination of the school last year, to observe the evident improvement there is, in those young ladies whom we recognise - having been in the institution twelve months ago, for their progress appears to have been a very solid and satisfactory And the increase in the number of scholars is a proof was this most valuable institution becoming thoroughly appreciated by the whole native community of this island. There one or two points, moreover, mentioned in the reports, which it would be difficult to pass by without notice. And firstly, the increase in the rate of payment is an important fact, as showing that Parei and Hindu gentlemen are beginning recognise the truth which we have long recognised in Europe—that a good education for ladies is not to be given without nersonal sacrifice and expense, and without entailing upon some parents considerable sacrifice. I must say that the inclination of the native community to their children a good education is to me most satisfactory, and there is another point which be equally gratifying to him to whom this institution so much-I mean the increased attention given to their own language in the instruction of children. For a long time it used to be said to Mr. Manockii Cursetii and others, " If you teach your girls the English language, they will forget their mother-tongue, which is the most useful to them wives and as mothers." But the truth is. there is great value in combining English with the Vernacular, for lady can learn any foreign language—and to these children English is a foreign tongue-without being improved in her own language. annot learn a foreign language without thinking for herself and deeply and accurately in her own, and therefore there is need to fear that in teaching Parsi ladies English, they will forget Guzerathi, and this day's proceedings is one of the proofs that the exact contrary is the case. | shows that if you teach them a foreign language, you teach them more in their tongue as well. I will not now detain you longer than by stating the great gradification it gives me to express to Mr. Manockji Cursetji how much pleasure I have mitnessed in what I have witnessed to-day and I am sure I only speak the sense of those present when I say to the Committee and to the lady visitors that they deserve and do receive our best thanks for what they have done for Institution.

PART IV. MISCELLANEOUS SPEECHES.

The Juanguration of the Sind Zuilway

[Karacki, April 1858.]

After Mr. Warren, the Agent of the Sind Railway, had addressed Mr. H. B. E. Frere, the Commissioner in Sind, requesting him to commence the Railway, the latter replied as follows;—

Mr. Warren and Gentlemen,-

I need not tell you, Sir, I undertake the duty with the most sincere pleasure. I think the first and most prominent feeling in the mind of every was here present, must be one of deep thankfulness to the Almighty Disposer of all things, who has carried through many and great perils and permitted us to meet together this day to commence a work of peace, undisturbed by those alarms which elsewhere have so changed the face of society in India. I trust that it is with an humble reliance - the same overruling Providence and not in any confidence in our own unassisted strength and power that we shall earry - and complete this great work. It is indeed work which, unless I greatly mistaken, will change the whole aspect of this barren plain where we stand. and aid in making Karachi one of the great cities of India. But it is not merely as a work of great local importance that we must regard it. It is, I believe, a great national undertaking. Of its commercial value it is not necessary for to speak. None of us who in Karachi short year ago, likely to underrate its importance as a military work. We recollect how, less than a year ago, watched with anxious expectation the passage of the alender reinforcements we able to send to the Panjaub. How for days after they left - we heard nothing of them - they crept slowly up river, and were glad to hear in anything less than a week, that they had safely reached Kotree. What would then have given for a railway which would bring Kotree mear in

In the last year, probably the most eventful in ____ Indian annals, we have been taught how great was our want of _____ This railway will enable one man do the work of ten. Of money our scarcely less urgent; of the value of ___ railway in this, ... economical point of view, it seems superfluous to speak. I sincerely hope it will be found a more of profit both to the Government and to all who me in any way connected with it. But a railway in India has, I believe, a higher function than that of m great military engine money-making and money-saving appliance. I believe it to be one of the greatest of civilisers. When the most active and energetic in the world so many thousand miles of and establishes such a work of art cost m great as the whole value of our English trade with India one short century ago, surely great moral changes must follow. A railway always to to bring out most strongly those deeply marked national characteristics which make our nation what it is. which have enabled us, a small and remote people, to bring our troops with the trophies on their standards, of many a fight in distant fields, to dominate were such a yast continent; and I feel sure that the execution of this railway will tend to impress more deeply on the native mind those great national characteristics, which have wen for me the respect of the natives, and have made me what we I cannot but hope that the grand result will be bind closer this country to England, and to prepare in a thousand ways unknown and unobserved by _ for that assimilation in interests and in faith which alone can render permanent - empire over so many millions of such different and languages. with hands like these that I would bind India closer England. We have now, I hope, passed through the talking writing stage, and all differences of opinion will, I trust, be interred under of Mr. Bray's largest embankments, and I most gladly, Sir, accept your invitation, to commence the stage of actual execution.

The Victoria and Albert Museum.

CEREMONY OF LAYING THE CORNER-STONE.

[Bombay, 19th November 1862.]

The Honourable Jagamath Sankarsett, President of the Victoria and Albert Museum Committee, in an Address reviewed the history of the undertaking, and requested His Excellency the Governor Is Isy the chief Corner-Stone of the Building.

[&]quot; Government Selection No. 83.—New Series, pp. 11-30 and 47-58.

[†] It was proposed to have the bust of the George Russell Clerk, G. C. II., K. C. It is a pleudid and extensive plot ground given for Victoria in a manual pleudid and extensive plot ground given for Victoria Cotober 1863, George Clerk declined with thanks sit for a Bust, and concluded by saying, that, "although truly grateful Committee for prompted their proposal to insur the expense of a sculptured Bust, I feel that I have no fair title to any distinction; while it cartainly will be just that others, through whose perseverance and contributions or both, the undertaking has been concluded, be there represented."

gratitude of our fellow-citizens, to whom Bombay much, I the late Dr. George Buist.*

You have, Sir, also, I feel sure, expressed the general feeling of all who are so of the nature of the difficulties to be in what you have said of our obligations to the Joint Secretaries. believe I rightly interpret the wishes of your Committee and Dr. Birdwood's excellent colleague Dr. Bhau Daji, in particularly specifying Dr. Birdwood, whose laborious exertions, so long continued, unselfishly and energetically rendered, are now, may hope, destined to be crowned with success.

This building will, I trust, be m fitting monument of the greatest event in the recent history of British India.

Here in Bombay, where the East India Company had ruled for two centuries, we, who were formerly subjects and servants of that Company, may be allowed to look back with not unnatural pride to the day which it was announced to all India that the Empire built up by that marvellous corporation had reached such imperial dimensions, that it was no longer possible for our Sovereign to rule over it with delegated authority.

It was in truth is historical is which deserved commemoration, and you wisely resolved, as you stood around the late Lord Elphinstone when he proclaimed that Her Majesty had assumed the direct sovereignty of India, that such is event should not remain without is enduring and visible monument.

But this building will mark, not only me in the history of Empires; it will be a record of me of the greatest boons which England could have conferred me India, when, in the memorable and gracious words of Her Majesty's Proclamation, Her Majesty declared not only her assumption of the powers of Sovereignty, but her me of its responsibilities, and her determination by the blessing of Almighty God to exercise those powers for the good of India. You have also resolved that this building should stand

m monument of the loyal love and personal affection you bear to Her Majesty. It would be neither becoming an necessary that I should attempt to recapitulate the many claims which you thereby recognize to your loyal attachment and admiration in the first sovereign who has since the dawn of history ruled over all India, the first oriental sovereign who has ever addressed her subjects in such words those with which Her Majesty's Proclamation concluded. The words are, I am sure, engraven wour hearts, but I cannot forbear quoting them membodying the feeling to which your present undertaking is a fitting response. Her Majesty declares, "When, by the blessing of Providence, internal tranquillity shall be restored, it is Our earnest desire to stimulate the peaceful industry of India, to promote works of public utility and improvement, and to administer its Government for the benefit of all Our subjects resident therein. In their prosperity will be Our strength; in their contentment, Our security; and in their gratitude, Our best reward. And may the God of all power grant Us, and to those in authority under Us, strength to carry out these Our wishes for good of Our people."

I think you have judged rightly in believing that Her Majesty would accept with the greatest pleasure this proof of your loyalty and devotion, if you connected with it the name of the late lamented Prince Consort, a which will not only be ever associated with all the glories and splendours of Her Majesty's reign, but with every private and personal virtue which claims was admiration and respect, and which has euthroned Her Majesty in the hearts of meany millions of her most distant subjects.

For such a purpose there is, I think, a peculiar fitness in the form of the memorial you have chosen. Among the many marked and enduring characteristics of this reign none is likely to live longer bear more valuable fruit, than the principle first practically recognised, and acted under Queen Victoria, of the duty of promoting by every the education and enlightenment of her Indian subjects, and no name will go down to posterity more intimately connected with particular form of education of Prince Albert.

For, let us remember, this Museum is designed to no collection of rarities and curiosities at which crowds may in vacant and resultless astoniahment; you have purposed that it may be a great engine of education. In the words you have so aptly quoted from the great law-giver of scientific investigation, a "College of Enquiry" and distinguished from a "College of Reading."

Here, in microcoam, you will collect specimens of whatever in Art Nature ministers to man's wants or occupies man's thoughts. The student will here read not through the imperfect medium of language in books, but in the very products themselves, visibly placed before him, the history, as far human eye in trace it, of each wondrous process and product of Nature. He will trace, step by step, how the intellect of man, in various ages and in various countries, the turned those processes and products to human use, how Art is striven to impart the result of her labours somewhat of that divine image, of those more human characteristics of beauty, variety, perfection, and adaptation for which the rudest of mankind ever years, and which the hav a few words the occasion which has brought us together today. I have come this evening not in the character of a representative of Her Majesty, but m private member of this community; because I feel that the occasion which has brought un together is one which very nearly concerns the honour and the character of the people of Bombay. It will be in the recollection of great many now present what occurred when the Museum was projected, and what passed at the meeting when the first subscriptions were raised towards its funds. Those who were not present that occasion will learn it. me doubt, from the report which will be laid before you, and you will have from those who entrusted with the expenditure of the money which - received, account, and I trust a very satisfactory account, of their stewardship. The question which will then remain for you to decide, and which I trust will be decided in a way that will mend itself to the approval of many who are not present, is briefly, whether the work is to be carried to an honourable satisfactory conclusion. I have medoubt whatever as to the response which the inhabitants of Bombay will give to this question; but I feel that there is some danger that there may fall upon this enterprise that kind of blight which is more or less apt to fall upon all enterprises in this country. I mean that delay and procrastination which forms the chief difficulty with those who commence an undertaking like this in carrying

It was to me a happy resolve that you have placed this Building close the Gardens of the Horticultural Society.

The student in the Museum will thus find himself in the presence of living Nature in her richest and most varied forms.

Such association must be favorable not only in supplying the materials of study, but in inducing the frame of mind in which enquirer is such likely to reach the truth.

The interior is to be fitted with ornamental iron work; gallery runs round the interior level at the first floor over the aides, supported on iron columns. to a satisfactory conclusion. There are not wanting in this city many prominent examples of this defect, which I fear is inherent in most Indian enterprises. I need go = further for an example than to the Memorial Church at Colaba, to which I refer, I believe I am of the few here present who had anything with the commencement of that work. It made noble object. which had been well considered, and which began with every promise of You all recollect for how many years this church remained a standing monument of the procrastination and delay to which I have referred, and nobody who were not intimately concerned in the enterprise itself tell how heart-breaking the feeling that this great work were after year left uncompleted.* Now, I would not like to we this sort of delay happen in the ____ before us; and it is because ____ to that very critical point in this enterprise that I think should consider the occasion which has called us together this day you plainly on this subject, because the enterprise is min in commencement of which in no way connected. As far in the Government is concerned, it belongs entirely to the time of my two predecessors. Originated in the time of Lord Elphinstone. whose memory is so dear to you, the work was planned and actually commenced in the time of Sir George Clerk, whose is held in such honor among you; and it is on this account, because it belongs to my predecessors, that I feel it a sacred duty to omit nothing which is in my power to bring the work to a satisfactory conclusion. Something has been said, and a good deal and alluded to, about this being rather an inopportune time to bring forward appeal to the public behalf of enterprise of this kind. Now, let me sneak plainly on this subject. We all know through what a crisis we passed a very few months ago. Every one of us has suffered-some of us in purse, some in the case of our friends-all of us in the case of those who more or less dear to us : and we are not likely to under-estimate the greatness of the calamity which has passed over us. But, I would ask you, do you believe that the permanent wealth of this great city is not infinitely greater than it was a year ago? I believe I may say with the greatest confidence, what any one member of the mercantile community who is acquainted with the actual state of affairs will tell you. that this city is far richer to-day than it was the year ago, Well, what is it that keeps it back? It is the particularly marked prosperity of this country. The profits of trade and enormous that it becomes more and more difficult to get people to part with money for objects of the nature of which I am speaking, and it is this which makes it more difficult it this than at other times to raise any considerable subscription. believe, you will all agree with me-all I know who - here present will certainly agree with me-that this is not a feeling which should keep back the people of Bombay from pleting and worthily completing what so well begun before the tide of extraordinary prosperity set in upon And recollect that this is not of those ephemeral projects which spring up during a period of exceptional commercial prosperity. period began;

therefore I think have not any right to turn to the commercial crisis which has since affected us, as a reason for not putting our shoulders to the wheel. I feel not the slightest doubt - to the ultimate completion of the work. I have too much confidence in the public spirit of our Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoys, - Framji Kavasjis. our Jagannath Sankarsetts, our David Sassoons, Sir Charles Forbeses, John Skinners, our Robert Wygram Crawfords, and John Flemings, and in the spirit which animates the successors of such gentlemen, to let doubt for me moment that they will act their predecessors would have acted before them. There is one more reason, to which I must allude before I conclude, and that is, that the gentleman whom you selected m your Secretary has, I m afraid, very materially injured his bealth, and will certainly be obliged shortly to take some rest from his self-imposed labours in connection with this enterprise. In his presence I cannot say anything in his praise. He would much rather that I should speak of his faults and his fuilings, and let and add, that his faults and his failings those of the typical Englishman. His vigour, his energy. the way he throws himself into his work, and his sympathy with those around him, the characteristics of the Englishman; and it is because he is an Englishman that he is emphatically a friend and lover of the natives of this country.* Such - he is, unless you enable him shortly to complete the work which he took upon himself on your behalf, there is too much much much fear that he may be obliged to leave it to others. For these reasons, I trust, that in this matter you will act promptly and well, and carry this work which you and your predecessors commenced a worthy conclusion.

Bombay, 12th August 1862.]

A public meeting held in the Town Hall, in behalf of the enfferers in the Cotton Manufacturing Districts of England.

After the proceedings had terminated, the Rev. Dr. John Wilson proposed a vote of thanks to His Excellency the Governor, for his kindness in presiding and the occasion.

III Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere replied :--

GENTLEMEN,-I cannot content myself with a silent acknowledgment of the vote of thanks. I must, in the first place, disclaim the honor done me by my friend Dr. Wilson, in attributing to me the credit of originating this meeting. The proposal to call the meeting had originated with gentlemen who, if I were permitted to them, would, I believe, prove to be the same who commenced the subscription in the Chamber of Commerce some weeks ago, the first news of the distress in Lancashire was received in this country. That subscription had been very liberally supported, but the intelligence of increasing distress in by each successive mail, it was felt that a subscription limited to a few classes of the community and quite inadequate to the occasion, and it was wisely resolved to call this public meeting,—a resolve which the results will, I think, fully justify. I have complied with the invitation to be present to-day, not only because I wished as an individual to express my sympathy with the sufferings of a large body of fellow-countrymen, but with a view of publicly expressing, with the concurrence of my colleagues who me unable to attend to-day, the great interest which the Government of Bombay take in meeting, the object of which | | mitigate a great national calamity. I cannot but augur much good from the results of your proceedings to-day. The subscriptions will, I have an doubt, furnish substantial relief of much physical suffering, but I believe the feelings we have this day heard expressed will go further than any money a can send to console the sorelytried working hands of our manufacturing districts under their heavy privations. I most fully in all that we well said by Dr. Bhau Daji of the value of this practical proof of your sympathy-of your feeling that the sufferers wour brethren in something more than our allegiance to the Sovereign—that you share their was well their joys, and that me prospect of immediate selfish advantage blind you to the greatness of this imperial calsmity-above all, that you cordially sympathise with and admire that heroic patience, self-control, and obedience to law, which enable them to bear so nobly misfortunes in no wise due to any act - default of their - Most truly it said by Dr. Murray Mitchell, that me facts regarding India and touch the hearts and arrest the attention of Englishmen at home, as do such proofs of fellow-feeling and community of interests. My native friends may rely on it that these things will not be lost on the classes whose some of the native gentlemen here present have to-day advocated with so much eloquence. The operatives of our manufacturing districts are well read and thoughtful far beyond what from the station in life of a working man, would be supposed possible. Among me class in England me there many reflecting students of theoretical and practical Politics and Political Economy, and probably class has taken intelligent and effectual interest in the great questions affecting India which have from time to time come before the British public. It said with great truth by another speaker to-day, that the workmen of Lancashire would value more than your sympathy, and far more than relief in money, would be work-good, honest, hard work; and m I believe India me supply all and me they need to give them that work, it has struck me that I may somewhat to the good results of this meeting if I touch very briefly on what has been done, and can be done, to enable this part India to supply the dearth of cotton which is the most of all this misery. We have learnt since last year truths of immense importance is the power of limit to supply is much England require. On the one hand, you have found come coming to your port from quarters whence it men came before. The simple stimulus of a rise in prices which few, if any, believed would be permanent, has largely increased the whence your supplies and drawn, and added whole provinces to the list of cottonproducing countries. On the other hand, the English spinners and dyers have found that, if not quite - well adapted to their purposes in the good kinds of American cotton, slight changes of machinery and trifling variations of process enable them to use good Indian cotton to advantage, and that if they would only get enough of such cotton, they need not fear a scarcity of material. has been asserted that the great rise of prices here has not yet told on the cultivators in the interior; that they are still in ignorance of the great prices which their cotton would command. I must be allowed to doubt this, and to express my belief that there is part of the country which supplies your port with cotton, where the fact of the late great rise in prices is not fully known to the tillers of the soil. Colonel W. C. Anderson, Survey and Settlement Commissioner, Southern Maratha Country, writes in seletter lately received from him, that contracts have been made by and of the ryots down there to deliver the produce of cotton-fields yet unsown, terms which would require a price of 16d a pound on an ordinary crop to repay the purchaser, and this, not in isolated cases, but so frequently as to leave me doubt that the Dharwar ryot is fully alive to the high prices of cotton in Bombay. Again, I read in the Calcutta Englishman of the 3rd August 1862, the following description of the state of things in the Panjaub :- " It is said that cotton, unfortunately not so good and clean it ought to be, is being exported in considerable quantities to Karachi, and am correspondent estimates the probable amount for this year at seventy thousand maunds, we two thousand five hundred tons. This is pretty well, seeing that cotton bas hitherto been imported into the Panjaub from East. In the former years the cultivators are said to have realized £ 500,000 extra by the sale of wheat; they is likely in reap another most unexpected profit from cotton, . the price has risen from seven, eight, and rupees per maund from sixteen nineteen rupees; the difference on the whole crop will be profit and above that of ordinary years. No wonder we hear that the Panjaub agriculturist is rapidly becoming independent of his banker, and taking the management of his money into his own hands." We must recollect that two years ago hardly a pound of cotton was found its way from the Panjaub | England. But you have here undoubted evidence from both extremities of your fields of cotton supply, that the cotton-growing agriculturist is fully aware of the field that is open to him, and is prepared to take advantage of it; and there can, I believe, be no doubt that the is the in Guzerat and Berar, and that all the stimulus which - be applied in the shape of a rise of prices, will operate this year to extend the production of cotton in Western India. The question of a vastly increased supply of cotton from Western India is however, almost every-where a question of roads. I know it will be said that in this respect the Government of India has been wanting in its duty to the country. I will not detain you to discuss the past. But in justice to my predecessors, I must say that I believe the verdict of posterity will not confirm this opinion, if we measure what has been done, by any standard but that of what is still required. Judged by this standard, there is indeed a vast deal still to be done, and I would not have you suppose that the Government are now inclined to estimate their present duty by any other standard. But in judging of the past, and leaving out of account all obstucles and difficulties, it is only fair to compare what has been done with what has been effected by other Governments, and if we make such a comparison, I firmly believe that, when we come to count the results of the last twenty years, it will be found not only that the British Government have made and better roads than were made dreamed of during the whole of the previous twenty centuries in all India put together; but that the work done will stand a fair comparison with what has been effected during the same time in any other country of equal extent in any part of the globe. I have ventured, in justice to my predecessors, to make this allusion to me past. But our business me is with the present and future, and in both respects. I see good ground for hope that, as far as facilities for transport are concerned. Western India will not be behind-hand in doing all that England requires of her. I need not dwell on the value of the railways m this respect. They have already reached the frontiers of our Presidency, in each direction of the great cotton fields in Guzerat to the north; in Berar to the north-east; and in the Nizam's country beyond Barsee and Sholapoor to the south-east. They are still incomplete, and owing the breaks at the Ghauts and alsowhere, they have only commenced imperfectly to fulfil their object in bringing down cotton. But they have already had a great effect in facilitating travelling into the cotton districts; so that it is me longer impossible for the Bombay merchant to go himself, or send his own agent, into the cotton district. In this respect sions, by facilitating commercial intercourse and enabling the merchant to visit the interior, the railways have already conferred. India benefit which would I believe, be cheaply purchased by the whole cost of their construction. What is now most required is the completion of the roads needed as feeders to the rails; and in this respect I promise that the Government of Bombay will not be wanting in its duty, and if hereafter it should be found that adequate progress, in this respect, has not been made, I must confess that the Bombay Government, and it alone, will be to blame. For we have no want of means, nor of encouragement from the Government of India, or from the Secretary of State, to do our duty by the country. Not only have they sanctioned all that we could show me required, but in all their communications they have not ceased to urge on me the necessity for making due provision for the wants of the cotton trade. But all this is matter for the future, and though it may, and I trust it will, furnish consolation to the operatives now starving for want of work, to know that work is likely, in future years, to be provided for them, must not forget the terrible winter which is before them, when want of food will be aggravated by want of clothing, of shelter, and of fuel, to we extent of which mutive of this country, who has me faced the rigors of m English winter, can form any adequate idea. From the miseries of such privation there is no escape save by is such in this meeting afford, promptly well as liberally rendered. In this respect have misgivings to the result of meeting this day. I know well the large-heated liberality of the native gentlemen of Bombay, and I feel assured they will content themselves with an expression of a barren sympathy; they will answer with their accustomed generosity to the call of suffering, and they will, in so doing, add link to the golden chain which binds together, in community of interests and feelings, the many nations and languages which are united under the rule of Her Most Gracious Majesty.

a subsequent communication, the Lord Mayor said, "this emphatic demonstration sympathy from Bombay will stratefully appreciated in the suffering localities; large [Bs 1,00,000] will see materially to augment our immediate distribution, and the noble example set cannot of beneficial inthroughout wide extent of the British Empire." [&]quot;This appeal to the benevolence of the community at large was very successful; the total amount subscribed for the Cotton Relief Fund, being a lac and a half Rupess which we immediately remitted in two instalments, to the Lord Mayor of the City of London, (the Right Hon'ble William Gubitt,) who in acknowledging the first of Rs. 57,000 thus wrote,—"I also venture to avail myself of this opportunity to express my deep week of the promptitude with which the Inhabitants Bombay have responded to the call of humanity and benevolence. It is indeed a pleasing characteristic of the case, that not alone have the European official and mercantile community, headed by Will Excellency the Governor, come forward thus liberally, but I observe, with respect and satisfaction, the week of many honored Native firms, whose hearts have been thus touched by the calamitous accounts the present state of these poor English operatives." The Opening of the Zhore Chant Jucline-

[Khandalla, 21st April 1863.]

Mr. John Parcs Bickersteth, Chairman of the Bombay Board of Directors of the above Railway Company, gave a detailed account of the Bhore Ghaut Incline, and concluded it by saying,

"The Directors beg to tender to your Excellency their thanks for the warm interest your Excellency has taken in the progress of the great works the completion of which we celebrate to-day, whereby all engaged upon it have been greatly encouraged in their labours; and they desire to request that they may be permitted permanently to connect your Excellency's name with the Bhore Ghant Incline, by recording the opening of the line by your Excellency upon a tablet to be erected in prominent situation on the Incline."

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere replied:-

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen—It is a matter of extreme gratification to me, both personally and on public grounds, to accede to your request. I have watched the progress of this work since the idea of a Railway to connect Bombay with the interior first occurred to Mr. Clark in the early part of 1844. I am glad to see among you this day some gentlemen

The proceedings of this very interesting event have been fully reported in the Rombay Saturday Review of the 25th. April 1863, p. 386 et seq., to which the reader's attention is directed.

For a complete and accurate description of this great work, Vide Mr. James John Berkley's paper on the subject, read in the Bombay Mechanics' Institution on the 21st December 1857; Transactions of the Institution of Civil Engineers, Vol. XIX, for 1859-60, pp. 586-610; and in Bombay Quarterly Beview for April 1855, Article III, pp. 281-322.

who took me active part in promoting the scheme from its very beginning; and it is with a feeling of deep thankfulness to the Almighty Disposer of all things, that I find myself now, as head of this Government, enabled to declare this great work, the BRORE GRACT INCLINE—the turning point of the whole undertaking-finished and fitted for public traffic. The first notice that I find on record of any attempt to improve the means of communication in this direction, dates in the early part of this century. The Duke of Wellington, then in command of our Forces in the Deccan, with that foresight which mann to have been a part of his nature. the importance of improved communication with Bombay, and caused the old Bhore Ghaut to be made practicable for artillery. and what me then considered a good military road to be constructed from the head of the Ghaut to Poona. You may yet, I believe, find traces of this road the whole distance | little to the south of the line which is now the old Post road, and be told that the massive stone ramps which mark the nullah crossings were the work of Wellesley Saheb. It is nearly 33 years since Sir John Malcolm, himself I friend and companion of the Great Duke, opened the Ghaut for cart traffic. In a minute which he recorded the subject, and a copy of which was shewn me by the Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Frere as ___ up the Incline, he thus speaks of the work. The minute is dated 23rd November 1830, "On the 10th of November I opened "the Bhore Chaut, which though not quite completed sufficient-"ly advanced to enable me to drive down with a number of gentle-"men in several carriages. The height of the mountain is " nearly 2000 feet, and the length of the road in 32 miles. "It is impossible for me to give a correct idea of this splendid work. " which may be said to break down the wall between the Koncan " and the Deccan. It will give facility to commerce, is the greatest " of conveniences to troops and travellers, and lessons the expenses " of European and other articles to all who reside in the Deccan. "This Ghaut will besides prove positive creation of revenue, " for I me satisfied from the decrease of hamallage, and the offers " already made to farm the duties, that the first year will produce "twenty thousand rupees, and that the ordinary revenue will "hereafter rise to than thirty thousand; while on any

" military operations occurring in a quarter which required the troops in the Deccan to move, the outlay would be paid by the " cheap transmission of stores in a twelvementh. That Government - have had such - return for the lac of rupees expended - this work " is chiefly to be ascribed to the enterprise, skill, and unwearied "industry of the contractor, Captain Hughes, who, in his desire " to do credit to himself, will be found, I believe, when the comple-"tion of the work is reported (which it will be before the lat of "January.) to have done more, particularly in the breadth of the road, "than the terms of the contract made obligatory. He has built " his work a small but neat lodge at the gateway, where the "duties are to be levied, and on this he has inscribed in manall marble slab the year in which the work was made. I wish him " to be instructed to place another below it, with inscription " stating that this Ghaut was constructed by Captain Hughes, was " commenced on the-of-and opened on the 12th November 1880. "I shall not anticipate the approbation Government may give " Captain Hughes when the completion of the work is reported and is " examined, or the consideration they may have for any useful work " he may have done beyond the terms of his contract. This res-" poctable gentleman will, I imagine, bring no claims upon the go-" vernmout. He is very sensible to the favor and indulgence with " which he has been treated in being aided with the detachment of " pioneers for a few months; but he merits the most liberal encour-"agoment, for he has not only executed in a superior work of great importance, but has set me example, which if fol-"lowed, will be attended with all the beneficial results that must " attend the establishment of contracts for such public works, to all who reside in the Deccan. " He then speaks of the work as an absolute reation of public revenue, and of its immense value in a military point of view. These must the words of one whose name will long live in honored memory as some of the wisest and most farseeing of modern Indian Statesmen. I quote them, not merely to contrast our present appliances and facilities with those which he thought so great and important an improvement - the then existing facilities for transport, but as calculated to inculcate a lesson of humility in judging of the improvement, of and day, and as showing how little the most far-seeing among we calculate what results a single generation may bring forth. When I first the Ghaut some years later. wery proud in Bombay of our mail cart to Poons, the first, and at that time I believe the only one running in India; but it was ween very later before the road was generally used for wheeled carriages. I remember that we met hardly a single cart between Khandalla and Poona; long droves of pack bullocks had still exclusive possession of the road, and probably more carts now pass up and down the Ghaut in a week than man then to be seen on it in a whole year. But the days of mail cart and bullock cart, m well as the Brinjaree pack bullocks, now drawing to a close. Of the great work, the Bhore Ghaut Incline itself, you have stated in your Address some of the principal statistics. I will not attempt to analyze their marvellous sults, were I to tell you that the bulk of so many pyramids contained in the earthwork and masonry of embankments-that it would take so many times all the bridges of London to equal the viaducts-or I to compare the bulk of the stone quarried with the break-waters of Plymonth or Portland- I could give you but imperfect idea compared with that which we all have derived from traversing the Incline this day. Nor could any description give to the uninitiated a notion of the difficulties you have had to overcome. Military who know what it is to organize and to feed army of 10,000 men, may have seem notion of the difficulties of organizing, feeding, and working a multitude of labourers averaging for years together 25,000 men, and rising to the enormous number of 42,000; but most of us must be content with the impression we have this day derived, and it is I am sure impression which can be effaced, of that which may I believe, without exaggeration, be described as the greatest work of its kind in the whole world.

I feel assured, that in future ages the works of man English engineers on these Ghauts will take the place of those works of their demigods, the great Cave Temples of Western India, which have molong, to the simple inhabitants of these lands, been the type of superhuman strength, and of months.

constructive skill. Mr. R. W. Graham and Colonel Rivers will probably not allow me to say, that this Incline will ever remain among the greatest works of its class; they knew the almost unlimited of their science, and will tell us that the greatest engineering triumph of to-day may be surpassed mu the present generation has died out. But the effects of these works on the fortunes of India arc. I believe, destined to be far important than merely supplying theme for popular admiration. or the substance of a popular proverb. I do not speak merely of their effect on commerce and material prosperity. It is scarcely possible to exaggerate the importance of the Railway in this respect; but this effect is so obvious and immediate that it hardly requires to be pointed out. Equally unnecessary would it be to dwell - the value of the Railway as a military machine. Some of m have served with the men of our old European Regiments, who marched with but one halt from Panwell to Poons to fight the battle of Kirkee; and all of us can estimate the immense military and political advantages of m work, which will connect all the capitals of India, and place the garrisons of Madras and Bombay as close to each other in point of time as those of Poona and Bombay were within living memory. It is no exaggeration to say, that the completion of great lines of Railway will quadruple the available military strength of India. Nor would I even dwell the manifold blessings which will attend the work m mitigating of the severest evils which can afflict humanity. We all of m know, either from mown experience, if from that of our friends, how great is the blessing of auch ready and easy means of intercourse, between distant pointsthe fever-stricken patient who longs for the cool ses-breeze. the wearied man of business who needs the bracing climate of the Deccan, need no longer experience, with . feeling akin to despair, the impossibility of moving; and every class, the roaming foreigner from a far land, as well at the home loving native of India, will have manne to bless the facilities which the Railway affords, for cheap and easy locomotion. But in addition to and above all these, this work will, I believe, be productive of moral effects in comparison with which its vast physical results may be literally said to be insignificant. You alluded in your Address to of those not present among us, to whom the great work is most beholden. You spoke in fitting of him whose genius its great features, who with such with spirit those who have given bodily form this conceptions; you referred in of well-merited regret to him whose judgment is firmness, united a kindly and sympathising nature, enabled the Government and Engineers of Company to work together with harmony practical energy unknown in other undertakings.* And you than fitting honour to the brave Englishwoman† who, in Interest, and by his personal exertions and active President, greatly increased suppore of usefulness,) instituted the "Berkley Gold Medal" as manual prize competition among its members, in commenceration of his valuable services.

In addition to the above, the Engineers on the staff of the G.I.P.E., the European and Native friends and admirers of Mr. Berkley united soon after his death, to prove their high appreciation of his talent well witheir great and affection him, by a substantial testimonial.

In a few days a seed in nearly Ro 20,000 mer raised, a greater portion of which me expended in the erection of a suitable monument over his grave, and a balance of Ra 16,000 mer thus appropriated,— the midst her sore affliction, thought more of her husband's honour than her and distress, and carried on a work the magnitude of which might well have appalled a Titan of old. It may be that the grant of Mr. James Berkley, of Col. J. H. G. Crawford, of Mr. S. Tredwell, may not survive the living memory of the present generation | but may rely on it, their example is not lost, and that it will be mearly immortal mhuman example may be in that peculiar characteristic which they have all in common, and which forms the backbone of our national strength—their noble devotion to their duty. I may not now refer to other examples of those still amongst us, which will I believe be equally permanent. But I cannot let the occasion pass, without tendering to all you have named having had a prominent part in this great work .to Mr. R. W. Graham and to in his staff, to Mesare, S. Adamson and G. L. Clowser, and to Colonel H. Rivers,—the cordial thanks of Her Majesty's Government for their share in this great undertaking. There is point to which I cannot but advert because I believe it calculated to exercise a permanent influence the future of India. I need not now remind my countrymen, that of the Western world have the character of being a stern and heavy-handed race. Among the many difficulties which beset, or were supposed to beset, the introduction of railways into this country, we usually placed foremost the difficulty of controlling a large number of independent Englishmen-not like our soldiers, bound by the ties of military discipline-not in any way prepared to submit their own will to the man dictates of authority. We have now ample experience to enable me to judge what foundation there was for such apprehension, and what has been the result? I do not pretend to say that there have not been exceptions-among the many hundreds of Englishmen who have been employed on these works, it would be strange if there not who possessed the more animal instincts of courage.

It who we her husband's decease, with a high spirit in the office of her affliction, conducted to business of the contract of this statement of the said with the efficient aid of Mesars. Adaptson and Clower, her Managing Agents, brought this great work to a successful termination.

strength, and capacity for physical exertion, in a higher degree than that inclination, to take the weaker side, the love of truth and of fair play, which mantion pride ourselves. But looking m the general results, and considering the effects which this invasion by a small army of Railway Englishmen has produced on the country, I think there cannot be a doubt, not only that the fears which some people entertained me entirely chimerical, but that the lower ranks of this railway army well which higher have left a deep and beneficial impression in the population among which they have been employed; and that the result is one for which countrymen of all ranks in your service, the artisans and mechanics well the gentlemen on the engineering staff, richly deserve the gratitude of the Government and of their country. So far from its being the case, that the bonds of official discipline mecessary to prevent the growth of ill-feeling between the Saxon stranger and the natives of India, I find the employment afforded by the non-official contractor almost invariably more popular than that of Government; and if both bent on raising an army, I doubt if Government could have more formidable rivals than Messrs. Adamson and Clowser. I know of sight mon impressive, or some full of suggestive topics to any one who reflects on the future of India, than such a visit = I lately paid to the contractors' works before they were finished. It was then easy to see how railway works taught the native labouror habits of method and punctuality, habits of truth and honesty in their work, and above all habits of independence. It is in this last respect more than in any other that I believe these railway works will have mimmonse influence on the future of India. We all know what vast sums, chiefly of English capital, have of late years been spent in this country. Let us consider for one moment what has been the effect of all this money being spent, in giving a fair day's wages for a fair day's labour. I can safely say that, as a rule, this we unknown before the commencement of what I may call the Railway Period; not only wages in most parts of the country fixed by usage and authority rather than by the natural laws of supply and demand, but the privilege of labour in general restricted to particular spots, and nothing like the power of taking III labor to the best market practically existed. This may partly due to custom, partly to the absence of any but agricultural employment, partly to long of despotic and unsettled Government. But the result was, that condition of the labourer was wretched in the extreme. the past efforts of Government could do but little to raise above the soil. All this has now, I happy to say, changed, mainly a direct consequence of these railway works; and for the first time in history the Indian Cooly finds that he has in his power of labour a valuable possession, which he it aright will give to him and to his family thing better than a mere subsistence, and that there means open to him of rising in the world other than by the same of a fortunate soldier or by the chance favouritism of Princes. And what has been the result of this discovery to him? Has it made him more indulent, less inclined to labour, more content to be satisfied with the existence which he can now procure with less labour than formerly? I believe there is no one who has any experience in the matter, who will not bear wout in saying, that this is not the case; the labourer is, of course, more independent, he in a better position to make his terms with his employer, and that is perhaps sometimes shown in which the employer does not quite like; but as a general rule, I believe the labourer works far harder, and acquires and more civilised wants, in proportion to the high wages he receives. But the effect is not limited to the labourer while he is on the railway works. Follow him to his sum home in some remote Deccan . Koncan village. and you will find the railway labourer has carried to his worm village not only me modes of working, wants, and new feeling of self-respect and independence, but _____ideas of what Government and the laws intend to meet to him; and he is I believe a better and more loyal subject, - he certainly is a useful labourer. Let _ to this effect _ the labouring population the inevitable irresistible tendency of railways to break the bonds of caste, and to destroy the isolation in which the various classes and races of natives have hitherto lived, and you have - aggregate of moral results such - may well be the subject of grave thought to those who are interested in the future of India, and particularly of us who have ____ in ___ own time and ____ continent the effects for good or for evil which must follow any great change in the habits of sold of feeling of large most of the people. As __ up the Incline to-day, two thoughts must, I think, have forced themselves - the minds of most of - The one - the immense importance to every who was then travelling, or may hereafter travel, up the Incline, of the general truth and honesty with which the work has been executed, and of the order discipline which we such an essential part of railway management. As __ the viaducts and spun round the edges of the hills, it was impossible to help feeling how much depended me the honesty of masonry buried perhaps many feet deep in the earth, and on the true forging of an axle or a coupling iron made thousands of miles away by people who rarely heard and seldom thought of India. Works such me have this day seen, possible only under strong, settled, civilized Government, where truth and honesty in the minutest details of ordinary work are held in habitual honour. But there was another feeling calculated to hush any national pride such results; it must the feeling of swe from which no must be free in the presence of such striking phenomena of nature, as the vast rocks and precipices among which the railway winds. One could not but feel the utter insignificance of man in the face of the great features of nature am so vast a scale, and the most thoughtless among me must have felt inclined say, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name be the glory." Let us trust, Sir, that the blessing of God which has carried the work thus for may rest me the work, that it may be such a permanent monument of our rule at a thoughtmagnetic patriotic Englishman may wish see raised by his nation, and as all who love India, whatever their was or creed, may rejoice to see completed, merely uniting distant provinces in bond of material prosperity, but knitting together distant peoples and races under orderly and beneficent rule, and thereby advancing cause of civilisation by which may be blessed alike to India England. And now, in mil name of Her Majesty's Government, I DECLARE THE BHORE GHAUT INCLINE FOR PUBLIC TRAFFIC.

The of "The Queen and the members of the Royal Family" having been drunk with enthusiasm, Chairman then proposed the Health of His Excellency the Governor.

In proposing this, Mr. Bickersteth said-

The tout I am about propose is one which, among us, needs as little introduction those which have preceded it, and I doubt not it will as enthusiastically received. It is the health of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay, the Queen's representative in this Presidency. None of us who in India the time will ever forget the unanimous thrill of satisfaction and delight which pervaded all classes of the community when the announce-of the appointment of Sir Bartle Frere as Governor of this Presidency reached the shores of Western India. Great as were the expectations then formed of the advantages which such a Governor would confer on this Presidency, they have not been disappointed: our highest hopes have already been more than realized. I propose the health of His Excellency Bartle Frere, and long may his rule be prolonged.

His Excellency in returning thanks said :-

Mr. CHASEMAN AND GENTLEMEN,-I thank you very heartily for the honor you have done in proposing my health. I can assure you that it is no mere official interest which I feel in the prosperity of this Railway. If there is any truth in the theory, that those who have known us from our earliest infancy are entitled to a double share of man regard, then indeed I may claim a high place among the earliest friends of the G. I. P. Railway; for I believe I claim the honor of having been mann of its existence earlier than any one else men in this country. It man in the early part of the year 1844 that the idea of a railway to connect Bombay with Tanna, Callian, and with the Thull and Bhore Ghant roads, first occurred to Mr.George Clark, when a visit with Colonel Turner to a Parai gentleman well known and respected among in those days, the worthy proprietor of Bhandoop. After some months of private discussion, the undertaking was formally brought before Government in s letter dated July 1844, and signed by Erskine Perry* and seven other gentlemen, among whom you wilt

Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy, who has been connected with the undertaking from the beginning. I sincerely congratulate them - the completion of work in which they took - early and intelligent interest, and I congratulate the Board on having among their number native gentlemen of so much wealth and consideration, whose presence at the Board during . no many years forms counterpoise to the ever-changing character of our community in general. The first Prospectus of the "Bombay Great Eastern Railway," it was then called, is dated 15th July I844, and contemplated a line almost absolutely identical with the present line ... far ... Callian. This Company, of which Mr. John Pollard Willoughby subsequently became chairman, merged in the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company which had been got up in 1845 in London. I have reminded you of all these particulars, for I believe to this Railway belongs the honor of being primus in India, the first of all the Railway schemes formally laid before the Government in India—the first to break ground when Mr. Willoughby turned the first turf in 1850, and the first to open m portion of its line in 1858. I am glad to think that Mr. Willoughby, who took m much and to this, he same President of the Board of Education, and the Bombay Branch of Boyal Asiatic Society, the same and mealous patron and munificent promotor of the Bombay Mechanics' Institution, the Native General Library, the Students' Literary and Society, the School of Industry, and in same of every thing which tended students' the School of Industry, and in the students' whether amongst the European or Native members of the community.

On the departure from India in November 1852, he was overwhelmed with addresses [Madras and Poons included,]. The Native Community of Bombay a subscription to amount of Rs 40,000, and endowed the Perry Professorship of Jurispradence connection with the Government Law School, as a memorial of long connection will law and education in India.

ceedings of the Government from that time to this. And here let me do justice to our old masters, the Court of Directors, who appear from the first we have taken a view of the Railway question, which, if it appears somewhat over-cautious to us, viewing it by the light of later experience, me liberal and enlightened in the extreme, when compared with the views taken at the same time by some their advisers. I have seen something of the management of other Railway Companies in India, and without drawing invidious comparisons and without flattery to this Company, I honestly congratulate all who me connected with it me the highly efficient and successful general management. Much me doubt is due to the distinguished shility of the Engineers—the late-lamented Mr. James Berkley, and Mr. R. W. Graham who has mefficiently supplied his place: much no doubt is also due to the judgment, tact. and good feeling of the Consulting Engineers, Colonels Crawford and Rivers; but I believe much is also owing to the Local Committee of Directors, a feature I believe almost peculiar to this among Indian Railways. And I cannot help attributing much of the good management and harmonious working with Government - well as with their own servants to the existence of influential body of Directors, possessed of local knowledge, and having the confidence of the shareholders, of the Railway officers, and of the Government. I would beg very sincerely to congratulate them in the name of Her Majesty's Government the completion of the great work of the Bhore Ghaut Incline, and with your permission. CEREMONY OF LAYING FOUNDATION-STONE.

After the Lord Bishop (the Right Rev. John Harding,) had addressed the assembly, His Excellency the Governor spoke as follows:—

Loap,—I gladly comply with your request, in laying the first stone of this Building; and in so doing, would beg very sincerely, — congratulate your Lordship, your clergy, and those of their flock here assembled, — the commencement of a work proposed — long ago by your venerated predecessor,* and which but for the zeal and energy of the Rev. Mr. Francis Gell, to whom the Church already owes so much in this part of the diocese, might have been further indefinitely postponed.

A whole generation has passed away since the first provision was made by Government, in Poons, for the worship of God according the ritual of Church. St. Mary's Church built by order of that great statesman, who founded and consolidated our empire in these parts. He designed it to be not simply a place of worship for troops, but a permanent and most significant witness of the determination of British Government never, by the blessing of God, voluntarily to recede from the conquest with which His Providence had here blessed our arms. The Church then built me essentially Military Church. We then simply in military occupation of this country. Poons merely a great camp watching the native capital of the Deccan, a province entirely administered by military officers. We had just subdued the great combination of all formidable military powers then in India, and military safety man of necessity, and first object. But an interval, long in fact, and longer still in its results to this country, now separates in from those days. The great who took counsel with their chief in the building which once stood where now agathered together; who ruled this country with so much firmness, such manly vigor, and such Christian moderation, are now all gone to their great account. In grateful people has just laid the last of the great soldier statesmen, trained in that school, in honored grave, where sleep the best and mightiest of England's dead, and I see now, now amongst us who could have stood by when St. Mary's Church was founded, little more than forty years ago. The great change which has taken place, in the interval, is marked in the different classes for whose modetion this Church is destined.

When St. Mary's Church was built, British soldiers in active vice were almost without exception its only possible occupants. As time has rolled on many hundreds of veterans, who have spent their lives in the service of their country, have settled around m; of their children, some follow their parents' footsteps in the Government service, others engage in various other occupations, but all look to Poons, as their home, and to India as their native country. Peace, and the closer ties which now knit England II India, have brought with them representatives of almost every class which form the home strength of England. Her scholars and her professional men and her artisans. are here, not as solitary wanderers, but with their wives and their little ones, taking the same permanent part in the life that throbs throughout this vast continent, as they have been accustomed to take their native land. The part they take is the same; but the issues. dependent on the manner in which each acquite himself are infinitely important to all around him.

It has been truly said that every Englishman in India is in some sense a public character. On the conduct of the poorest among us may depend the judgment, formed by thousands, not of his own personal qualities only, but of his nation and people, and of what is far important—of his religion also. Each of our fellow-equatrymen here has in his hands, to no trifling extant, the character of the Government and nation, and is able directly to influence those who, from among our native fellow-subjects, may be induced to enquire what believe, and what hope for, and, by what motives actuated, and according to the answer they may receive from conduct, as witnessed by them, they will either shun our association, and dread our contact, seek to join themselves in in in which they recognise as the main-spring of a ctions.

If we, we Government, have hitherto done less than was needprovide for our countrymen suitable of worshipping God after the manner of our forefathers, let it me be attributed to indifference. Amid the tamult of incessant there are scant leisure mopportunity for thinking of aught beyond the immediate physical necessities of the day; but by the blessing of God, bave reached one of those intervals of peace and prosperity which so rarely vouchsafed to a great empire. May He enable uto it to His Glory and to the benefit of me fellow-subjects! I me testify the hearty desire of Her Majesty's Government, both in this country and in England, to do their part = a Government to afford to our fellow-countrymen, at least, the opportunity of attending the public ordinances of their own faith, and of maintaining, in their persons, and of having taught to their children, in such churches and schools we have been used to in wown land, those principles of religion which we believe to be the foundation, not only of individual excellence of character, but of national strength and prosperity.

We know how little Government alone and do to supply all that is needed in the way of religious education and public ordinances. Not only the greater part of the material means, but life must make from within the Church. Government can do little make than supply as it were, the thread to connect the scattered efforts of those who may too poor and incapable of connected and combined action, to help themselves. But experience shows that if Government does its duty in this respect, may reasonably trust to the zeal of the Church to do the rest.

Let wonly bear in mind, that we position here is a longer simply that of conquerors—come to-day and gone tomorrow, as the periodical reliefs, or the completion of service may distant lands. There is a large and increasing body of Christians in this neighbourhood to whom India is their home; and in Church here to be erected, we hope that they and their descending, for ages to come, continue to worship, and to we so to conduct themselves, that many may drawn from the millions around to seek to join themselves in faith, and allegiance to people who possess so holy and pure a religion.

In this sense, the Building design, may be a permanent beacon whence the day-spring from on high "may shine, to give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death—at the same time that it shall surely guide our feet into the way of peace.

The Lord Bishop of Bombay, (the Right Rev. John Harding,) said, that they owed a debt of gratitude to His Excellency the Governor, both for his presence there, and for all he had done in this matter. This Church had been projected, we His Excellency had observed, by the last Bishop; but in this and in many such there we always found to be great financial difficulty in carrying out the design. In the present case, when circumstances were changed, His Excellency had himself suggested building this Church, and taken great interest in the design. They were grateful to him more for the words he had spoken that evening. His Lordship than closed the proceedings by pronouncing the Benediction.

CEREMONY TER FOUNDATION-STONE.

[Poons, 23rd September 1863.]

Mr. Bhaskar Dámodhar, Socretary to the Managing Committee, read Address to His Excellency the Governor, containing the history of the above Institution, after which Mr. David Sassoon said:—

Honourable Sir—It is a matter of great satisfaction to to find that have assembled together again this year to witness the foundation of an institution for the benefit of our less fortunate brethren. The Poona Infirm Asylum, which its projectors have done me the honor to call after my name, will, I trust, under Divine Grace, be the means, of affording relief to many helpless person, and of raising them from a state of social degradation to position, which however humble, would be not unworthy of human beings. We have all reason congratulate ourselves on the establishment of such useful institution, which should have long preceded one for the protection, of infirm beasts. Its projectors deserve the best thanks of the public for their exertions.

I will not take up the time of the meeting by dwelling in the importance of the institution which has already been pointed out, if indeed it requires to be pointed out, by the gentleman who has spoken before me. I shall, therefore merely commend the Institution in the patronage of your Excellency, and beg that you will lay its foundation-stone, a task which, knowing the infelt by your Excellency in every thing calculated to promote the public good, if feel confident will be agreeable to you.

His Excellency Sir H. B. II Frere then replied :--

Mr. Sassoon, and Gentlemen—I gladly undertake the duty you would entrust to me; for that this is work of no ordinary interest and of importance to this city and community.

Its interest is not in its cost, in the large amount of contributions offered for establishment, though they sufficient to have marked it me important institution in any of the great cities of the west, nor is its special interest derived from the fact that | large | portion of the cost has been contributed by the Merchant Princes of Bombay, for we have had in Poons many, and striking instances, of their charitable munificence. The chief interest and importance of the work, in my eves, is due to the fact that the Institution been organised, and that the Funds have been raised, and rangements thus far made towards the completion of the design, mainly by gentlemen belonging to the Hindu community of this city, aided by a few of their brethren belonging to Bombay. You have truly observed in your address the duty of helping the helpless, of providing for the really infirm and needy, and of doing good to men, is strictly enjoined by the ancient precepts of your religion. It is inculcated in your ancient books, and the spirit of the injunction pervades the teaching of all your ancient philosophers and sages. But it had to pass in process of time that the universal practical application of such precepts was well nigh forgotten, and up to wery recent period, the very name of " charity," in this city of Poons, conveyed little meaning to mankind in general beyond supposed duty of indiscriminate alma-giving to whose only claim to relief founded me their belonging to a particular race. It is greatly to the credit of that race, and it is a most satisfactory proof of the enlightenment which follows any well-directed system of education, to find the Brahmin gentlemen of Poons coming forward to organise an Institution of this kind, founded on principles which would do honour the most enlightened communities of the Western world. is moreover, a most gratifying circumstance to find these gentlemen originating, and carrying forward towards completion, Institution like this, with so much practical good power of organisation. Mr. William Hart, the Revenue Commissioner of the Southern Division, who has taken so me interest in this work from its commencement, has informed ___ that, although many European gentlemen were willing to assist, the whole design has been originated, organised, will thus far carried out by Messrs.

Vinayakran Vasudevaji,* Bhaskar Damodhar,† Narayan Bhai,‡ Daji Nilkant Nagarkar your architect,§ and by the other native gentlemen whose names are recorded in the Address you have just read.

Few things could, I am assured, have given a distinguished servant of Government greater pleasure, the eve of his leaving the country, in which he has so long labored, than to find the leading native gentlemen of Poons united together for such a purpose m this, and shewing so much practical ability in giving effect to their design. To you, Mr. Sassoon, I cannot help expressing the deep additional interest = all feel from the part you have taken in this matter. Belonging to a race so intimately associated with all which we walke in this world, and with our hopes for the next, you have come from the banks of the Euphrates to pursue your peaceful calling under the protection of the British Crown, and no Englishman can view, without emotion, the spectacle of your devoting so large a portion of the well-earned fruits of your industry, to relieve the necessities of the poorer inhabitants of this ancient capital of the Marathas, which has now become one of the seats of British Government in Western India. I trust that God will permit you to see the completion of this Building, of which I will now proceed to lay the foundation-stone.

[Paona, 8th October 1863.]

Mr. David Sassoon addressed Excellency the Governor IIII

Honourable Sir-Permit we express my most sincere thanks vour Excellency, to the Hon'ble Members of your Excellency's Government, and to the several Members of the Managing Committee appointed to see the design carried out. The object of the Building of which the first stone is now being laid, is to relieve the physical sufferings of the poor of this large City, and I can only hope that the work = auspiciously commenced will be brought to = successful a completion. That such will be the case cannot, I think, be doubted. Sanctioned by your Excellency's presence here to-day, and by that of your Hon'ble Colleagues, the Members of the managing committee, the Engineers and the Medical Officers concerned, I feel the less hesitation in expressing my belief that one of the most cherished schemes of my life will be fully realized. interest which your Excellency has ever taken in all that relates to the prosperity of Western India, and to the welfare and the happiness of the neople, indicated to that under more gifted popular administration than the one of which you are the distinguished head, could I hope to my object substantially supported, and its ultimate success guaranteed.

^{*} On the 7th October 1867, this building was opened to the public by His Excellence Sir W. R. Seymour, V. FitzGerald G. C. S. I. "It is in the English-Gothic style, It affords accommodation for 144 patients, allowing each 75 superficial feet and 1,400 cubic feet of space, and an am emergency the verandes can accommodate in manual it Is 327 mm in length, with a depth of 94 feet at the centre; upper-storied, with a westerly aspect (the western verandas are areaded to admit the sea-breese) the eastare enclosed. Wings terminate in projecting masses, which, m well as the centre, are gabled. At the south-west angle a clock and water tower rises m a height of 117 feet; water from this tower will be distributed throughout the building. For a height of feet this tower is solid, but above opens into a tall lancet light, and moovered by a high-pitched roof. On each flour wards, the largest of which m 72 feet by 24 feet, each of three smaller being m × 24 feet. The operating-room is were the carriage-purch. The whole building is of random masonry, with out-stone quoins; the roof metal, an a pitch of 45°, and ventilated by dormer rose windows above the ceilings. The total cost has been Rs. 3,10,060, which David Samoon contributed Rs. 1,88,000."

I will not detain you with a recapitulation of all that you have in a very brief space of time achieved, not only for this presidency but for imperial India. But I may be permitted to express in conclusion my hope that the great works of public utility and universal benevolence which have been commenced in Western India under your encouragement, may with the blessing of Heaven, be satisfactorily completed as to render the leading features of your administration of the brightest chapters in the History of India, and your own household word in the Homes of Hindustan. I therefore ask your Excellency to lay the stone after the custom observed in such ceremonies, and begingain to thank you for the knoor which you have conferred upon me this day.

His Excellency then replied :-

Mr. Sassoon, and Gentlemen — I shall have much pleain complying with your request, for I regard the occasion one of peculiar interest to Government, to the people of Poona, and all who feel an interest in the welfare and progress of India.

Poons for more than a century the virtual capital of the Marathá country and people. For the last thirty years it has been the occasional residence of the British Governor of Western India. It is now made by the Railway an almost integral part of the great commercial metropolis of Western India.

But when the traveller enquires for our Pablic Buildings, our Public Institutions, what have we to show him? Beyond some useful and necessary shelter for troops, the Government has no public buildings distinguishable from private residences of the most unpretending character—even the palaces and temples of the native dynasty are singularly poor and devoid of architectural effect, compared with what may be seen in other native capitals, and there is an almost total absence of architectural effect in buildings, which are solely devoted to the material and most elementary wants of simple protection for life and property, and for locomotion.

You have resolved, Sir, to be among the first to wipe away this reproach from Poons, and to join the Government in erecting building suited in size and architecture to be the principal Hospital of this metropolis of the Decean. Here you hope that every physical infirmity and every form of suffering, to which human flesh is heir, shall receive the best treatment which European medical science and skill and afford. This aid will be given without distinction of race, or rank, or age, or sex, or station, with all the large-hearted liberality which has characterised your public benefactions, and your design that the building provided shall be on mescale and of mechanical suitable to the noble public object which the Hospital is to fulfil.

Colonel Henry St Clair Wilkins will, I have no doubt, do ample justice to your wishes in this respect, and I can assure you on behalf of myself and my colleagues of the cordial and sympathising co-operation of the Government in the matter.

It is difficult to state fully all the public manners which enhance the satisfaction with which Government have complied with your wishes in this respect, without touching on personal details which you would, I am sure, have rather I avoided and to which I would allude very briefly and only because they me connected with public considerations of great weight and moment.

It is now, Sir, some thirty years since you first came among us in Bombay. During that time you have vindicated your claim to rank among the most enterprising, energetic, and successful of our merchants. In every port of the Eastern world where the British Flag is to be seen, there has been the theatre of your commercial enterprise. In every eastern mart your world is known and respected, and you have been ble-sed with a condinary share of prosperity in all you took in hand,

But more than this. From the very first it has been your wont to devote marge share of the fruits of your prosperity to the relief of the suffering and indigent. Your name was known in connection with plans of wise and judicious philanthropy long before it had attained its present repute on the changes of the world. One among those plans I cannot help mentioning as more particularly characteristic; I allude to your endowment six years ago of the Sassoon Reformatory for juvenile offenders. In making it, as it now is, so of the great public Institutions of Bombay, you manifested a benevolence as calightened and discriminating as it man munificent, and strove to cure poverty and disease by attacking their origin, by reforming the youthful offender, by curing him of his vicious propensities, and training him to habits of peaceful industry and order.

It is, I know, Sir, a source of gratification to you, as it is to all of us, that you have not stood alone either in the ample prosperity which has attended all your undertakings, or in the excellent use you have made of those means with which Heaven has blessed you. In these respects we have witnessed a generous, honourable rivalry with many of your friends and contemporaries in Bombay. But there is one feature in your career not directly connected with this present undertaking to which I, as an Englishman, cannot but refer with peculiar pleasure, and the more so because I believe there is unwillingness, on the part of those who feel with you - questions of pure philanthropy, to follow your example in this respect also. You have shown the sense you entertain of the blessings you receive under the British Government, by training your children after the fashion of those classes to which Her Most Gracious Majesty. and the Butish nation, habitually look for the men to be trusted in public as well as in private affairs.

It is not every of the native gentlemen of Bombay, in these days of general prosperity, who impossed follow your example, by purchasing an English estate, and enrolling himself among the landowners of England; but there are many who can do you have done, in sending a son to an English school and college, there, to learn not only what English gentlemen know, but what they feel and think subjects of note permanent interest and importance, than how the wealth of modern commerce is accumulated and distributed. I must apologise to you, Sir, for touching on a subject personal yourself. My excuse must be, that I could not refiain from noticing the prominent and prevailing feeling of sympathy which you have ever manifested with the British Government and British people—a feeling which enhances manifold the interest which English people feel in all that you do. I will now only add an expression of the feeling in which every one here present will join me—that you may be permitted to me this Building suitably completed, and fulfilling all your benevolent intentions me a permanent relief to suffering humanity; and that you may long be a living example of that blessing, which the Royal poet, of your me people, has declared shall ever attend him who provides for the sick and needy.

Christ Church, Birkee.

CEREMONY OF LAYING FOUNDATION-STONE,

After the Lord Bishop (the Right Rev. John Harding,) had addressed the assembly, His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere said;—

My Lord. - With the _____ of His Excellency the Commander in-Chief, (Sir William Rose Mansfield,) Laccept the duty you entrust to me with the me feeling of pleasure in the of this,-a purely Military church,-as I did a short time since when we laid the foundation-stone of the Church at Poona, which was mainly intended for the non-military classes. Its construction will I hope appropriately mark the transition from Kirkee 'camp,' to Kirkee 'station'-from the simple 'cantonment' to the 'garrison, ' It is I believe essential to the military security of ____ Empire that our troops should ever be, they have always been heretofore, ready for instant service in the field. But this is not inconsistent with-indeed it almost necessarily implies the existence of fixed places of strength -the citadels it were of the positions held by our troops, and such I hope Kirkee will become as the permanent Head Quarters of our Artillery. The construction of this Church will also I trust mark emphatically the changed views which we now all hold with regard to relation of the British soldier to his church and his apiritual teachers. There a time not far distant from the present when it ___ a dictum perpetually asserted and often honeatly believed by men who were accepted as authorities in such matters, that the wilder and licentious the the better soldier he made. This fallacy has been now I trust for ever exploded. Our greatest living military authorities act on the principle that the better and happier the soldier is, the me formidable is he in fight, the more exemplary and well disciplined is he in quarters. Honce they labour incessantly to improve not only his physical condition by giving him better quarters, better terms of service, and more material comfort, but also to raise his moral and intellectual status, by giving him better means of mental improvement, a more varied and higher possible career, and by making provision for his spiritual and religious instruction. all those respects I need hardly assure you the civil Government go entirely with the great military authorities, and desire to make the profession and position of a soldier in this country one to which the parents of England need not be afraid to entrust their children with the assurance that setting aside the great contingeneics of war, there is nothing in the profession of soldier in India which need cause greater anxiety for the physical or moral welfare of their children than any other profession which necessarily detaches us from the land of birth. We Englishmen have learnt to look me the art of me as one every way worthy of a true Christian. The more we of amateur soldiers the more do we value the trained veteran who is a soldier by profession, who looks on war in its true light in the ultimate appeal, where there is no other arbiter, - human tribunal to decide, who prosecutes war with a full knowledge of its tremendous responsibilities, and due value for those laws of what me call Honour and Chivalry,compendious terms for describing all those feelings which distinguish the pursuit of what is noble and unselfish from that which is base and sordid. We would therefore have our soldiers' churches in external fabric calculated to revive and keepalive all those feelings which would be produced in the young soldier's heart by the noble churches of the land of his childhood, such we hope the Church which the Rev. Mr. Francis Gell has designed for Kirkee will be. I have a poculiar personal picasure in taking any part in the crection of any church intended for the use of the artillery. The officers of this artiflery regiment were among the first to welcome in my early days when I first arrived here many years ago. Some of them have been my most valued friends through life. Many of the good artillery men of those days fill soldiers' graves in distant lands: few and war-worn the veterans who romember those days and now stand around us. I would gladly, before I quit this land in which my best days have been past, join my old friend Colonel Forster and the Rev. Mr. Gell in laying the foundation of a church in which young artillerymen in future years will meet and worship and will recall the lossons taught them in childhood and learn to be better Christians. For we are well assured that they will thus become better soldiers, and that, as long as they remember their baptismal your as Soldiers of the Cross, they will never dishonour the flag of Old England, of which the artillery regiment has ever been among the best and most devoted defenders. It is for this reason that I heartily thank you for inviting me to take a share in this ceremony.

THE CENSUS III BOMBAY.*

[Bombay, 14th January 1864.]

Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace assembled in the Town Hall for the purpose of meeting His Excellency the Governor, must the subject of taking a Census of Bombay.

The Hon'ble M. H. Scott read the notice convening the meeting, after which

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere addressed the meeting, explaining the reasons of baving taken the unusual course of asking the Justices to meet for the purpose of consulting the subject of the Census. His Excellency observed that under former constitution of the law, the Beuch of Justices took an active part in all municipal matters, but it in no intention of the framers of the Census Act (Bombay Act XI of 1868,) that the Bench of Justices should be deposed from their influential position to take the Census. His Excellency thought it advisable to confer personally instead of communicating by letter with the Justices

Although Bombay Act 11 of 1863 and disallowed by Her Mujesty's Secretary of State for India, yet the Census of the Town and Island of Bombay 11 taken on the 2nd February 1864, under the superintendence of Mr. C. J. Forjett, the then Commissioner of Police. The total cost was about Re 24,000; half of which was borne by Government, and the remaining defrayed by the Municipality. Government in their Resolution of 18th. February 11 stated that great credit 11 due to Mr. Forjett, and their special thanks 11 conveyed to the following Gentlemen, 12 having rendered assistance in carrying out 11 wishes of Government; 11 on the subject. - being - more efficacious course to bring about the desired result. The question to be considered and which required the earnest attention of the Justices, was the taking of the Census of the town and island of Bombay. His Excellency expressed the hope of the Government to raise the Bench of Justices to the influential position they formerly occupied. All attempts on former occasions to take a Census had failed, in consequonce of which the present Act was passed. His Excellency thought it right to notice the usual objections to Census boing taken in this country, chiefly by the ignorant classes of the population : the first of which was, the prejudice existing among the uneducated masses that it was an unlucky thing to allow the counting of the members of one's family; but this was quite an unfounded objection, and might be easily removed. The account objection was on the score of religious scruples, which partially evisted amongst Europeans as well as natives, but which should not be allowed to provail in a civilised society. The third was the fear of favation which generally prevailed indespetic countries, but could not prevail under the British Government. The fourth a social objection, most of the families being unwilling to give any information of the members composing them; but every care would be taken to prevent undue enquiries being made into the secrets of families. The fifth and last objection which most people were apt to take, was the oppression of the ignorant and poor people by the lower orders of Government servants entrusted with the execution of the Act: but as far m possible this cause of dissatisfaction would be removed by the authorities. His Excellency then dwelt upon the importof having m accurate Census, remarking, that such returns most essential to good government, and that it me of immense importance to the people to know the modes of their living, and which information could only be obtained from accurate statistics. In illustration of this, His Excellency noticed the inconvenience and delay occasioned in the man of the Parsees when asking for legislation, for want of accurate information to the extent of their community. To have me accurate Census in Bombay would be to lay the foundation of sanitary reports. His Excellency then stated the advantages derived from applying the principles of sanitary science to practical life, and said, his own impression was that sanitary science the science of removing all evils which shorten natural life and impair natural health, and was - of the most important subjects which should occupy the attention of the community. How to preserve in a close and crowded community the qualities which preserve life, m good air, good water, and good food, man the object of sanitary science. It me the opinion of medical authorities, that immense disadvantages arise from neglecting the simple rules of sanitary science, and such diseases as cholers. small-pox, and fever, result in consequence. His Excellency noticed the increase of deaths during the past week from cholers, which might be attributed to the want of good food and water and pure air. The causes of these diseases might be easily traced by knowing from the Census the man of the locality and the number and the mode of living of the residents. His Excellency remarked that it was a mark of civilisation to have an accurate Consus, as in despotic countries it could not be accurately taken.

Sir Jamestji Jejeebboy Bart, the Honourable Jagannath Sankarsett, Framji Nasserwanji Patel, Varjivandase Madhavadas, Cursetji Nasserwanji Cama, Kharsetji Rastamji Cama, Nowrozji Furdunji, Dossahboy Framji, Ardasesr Framji Mus, Bhaskar Sundarji, Ramchaudra Lakshumanji, Madhoba Hurrychaudji, and the Cazee of Bombay.

His Excellency then showed a draft form of the Return, which was made in little complex in possible; copies of which would be supplied to the Justices for any alterations or corrections they would choose to make, and to which he would pay his best attention. As regards the agencies to be employed in collecting the information, every expense would be incurred, and qualified persons would be selected from educated classes for the purpose, while people requiring explanation would have free in to Dr. A. H. Leith and Mr. Charles Forjett. In conclusion, in Excellency asked the Native Justice. especially, to explain to their ignorant neighbours the advantages of having a Census, to remove all prejudices from their minds, to visit the different localities where the Returns would be distributed, and afford every information.

The total population of the Island of Bombay and the shipping in land harhour by the Census, was found to be 8,16,562 persons. The Cowasji Jehanghier Jospital, Surat.

[Surat, 18th January 1861.]

His Excellency the Governor held a Durbar at the Surat Adam's at, for the reception of the Civil and Military Officers, Native Gentlemen of rank, and the Sur-Soobha of Nowsares.

After the reading of the report by Mr. R. W. Woodhouse, the Executive Engineer, had concluded, His Excellency said that in the first place he regretted that Mr. Cowasii Jehangier Readymoney should have been prevented by sickness from being present on this interesting occasion. However it a natter of deep satisfaction to all, that this Building, which had under some circumstances taken up many years, was now completed, and ready for the humane purpose for which it had been designed. He was highly gratified at the prospect which was now before this ancient city, and observed that he had personally marked the stages of prosperity and ruin which this ancient city, the very first landing place of the people from England, had pussed, and he glad to anticipate it would in a few years again revive its uncient glory and Saturnian days. He marked m great change in the appearance of Surat since he last visited it, saw better houses and roads, and was gratified to remark that two most important works man already commenced, viz,those of educating the ignorant mann and affording remedy and relief to those inflicted with diseases. His Excellency observed the praiseworthy attempts made by several of the millionaires of Bombay to raise up this fallen city from its misery. He specially mentioned the Hou'ble Rastamji Jamsetji Jejeebhoy, Messrs. Cowasji Jehangier, Cursetji Furdunji Parak and Sorabji Jamaetji Jejechhoy prominently concerned in the improvement of this city. He aliuded to the proposal of Mr. Sorabji Jamsetji Jejeebhoy to build the School-House opposite the Castle, thanked that gentleman for his munificent offer, and expressed a hope that Mr. Sorabji would not fail to make the building suitable . the locality. His Excellency then exhorted the Municipality devote its attention by taying out gardens and adopting for the free supply of to the people and otherwise improving the appearant of Surat. He next referred to the fact of his having travelled from Bombay to Surat by Railway, and thanked Colonels J: P. Kennedy and J. S. Travoz, and Mr. J. B. Lane for their exertions upperintending and completing the railway works. His Excellency hoped that on the opening of the Railway between Surat and Bombay, many native gentlemen who had lately amassed princely fortunes, would make this at their country residence, leaving for a time the monotony and anxieties of Bombay life.

Mr. Robert and Pinhey C.S., the Judge of Surat, thanked and Excellency the Governor on behalf of the assembly for his kindness in opening the Hospital.

On arriving this Station, M. Recellency Sir H. E. Frere, K. C. B., held a Durbar for the reception of Rajah Saheb Battansing Jadhavarao of Malleganm and the Wattandars of Indapoor.

His Excellency in opening the proceedings spoke as follows:—

Gentlemen,—Soon after the death of Mr. H. E. Goldmid, a subscription — raised to erect a suitable monument — mory. Much difference of opinion prevailed among the sat to the best form and place for the monument. It was only had year decided that it should be a Dharmashala for Native

Decksal Station, close to the spot, where nearly thirty years the Deccan Revenue Survey and Assessment system was commenced, in originating and maturing the plans which Mr. Goldsmid had so great a share.

It might be asked, by those who did not know him, why many people should be invited together to do honour to memory of a servant of Government, who however sminent his services, had been many years at rest, and who now aleeps far from this country, in the English cemetery in old Cairo.

There are many here present, who could among this question. No man in the Service had man warmer personal friends, me who had were known him could ever forget or think, without affectionregret, on his ardent, energetic temperament. has warm affection for all that was good and disinterested, his hatred of all that was mean and selfish, his playful fancy, his inexhaustible wit. Nor this all. He had other claims be long remembered. He was one of those who man gifted by man with the rare power of impressing something of their own character, upon all with whom they came in contact, and it was no exaggeration to say, that he gave a bias and a colour to the whole character of the civil administration of this part of India during the last quarter of a century; for there - few Government servants who have borne a prominent part in the civil administration of Western India, of late years, who however much they might have differed from him in opinion, do not trace to Mr. Goldsmid's influence a part of that devotion m public duty, and postponement of all private interests to those of Government, which is the secret in real and permanent in administration, and for which he remarkable.

But it not only his countrymen, and over associates in the service of Government that his influence extended. There are two which must often strike any who attentively considers our position in this country. The one is the race with a service, energetic Englishman, who sympathism with the of this country obtains an absolute personal over them whilst he smoong them, without any feedel.

or religious tie of race or greed, but by mere force of character sympathy,—and in respect, I have seldom seen any one surpass Mr. Goldsmid. Outram, or General John Jacob, had a more absolute control, while either lived the lim and of the Natives around him, than Mr. Goldsmid had. The other peculiarity is, we less flattering to our national pride. All who have devoted their lives to the public service in this country. must have felt that however easy it is for conquerors write our own in annals of politics, it not easy to write them in the hearts and memories of the people. How few public servants do any of us know whose will be remembered by the people for an ahort generation after they have themselves passed away? But with respect to Mr. Goldsmid how different will be the result. This spot, (DECESAL STATION,) has been chosen for his monument, because it mear this place that the Deccan Revenue Survey and Assessment system commenced. It has proved a great blessing to the people, not only of this part of India, but of several neighbouring provinces, and the name of Mr. Goldsmid will live in connection with that great work, in the grateful recollection of the simple cultivators of these districts, long after the most costly monument - could erect to his memory would have perished. The poor and the helpless had ever his sympathy, and there were few things in which he took a greater personal interest than in providing such shelter me this Building will afford to the way-worn native traveller. Let us trust that hereafter more of those who shelter in this place will remember with gratitude the name services of him in whose memory we found it,

[Poons, IIII October 1864,]

Mr. William Wordsworth, Principal of the Deccan College read an Address to His Excellency the Governor, containing sketch of the history of the above Institution, after which Sir Jamestji Jejeebhoy said;—

Honourable Sir,— All who interested in the progress of education among the Natives of Western India, will feel smoerely grateful your Excellency for your condescension and kindness in attending here to-day. I may be permitted to add, in an especial way my personal thanks, you your Excellency is inaugurating an important educational work, you are at the same time, paying a distinguished honour to myself, and my family, and of this honour we deeply sensible.

The re-organisation of the Poona College in appropriate buildings this healthy and beautiful spot, will produce, I truet, fruits of the best and lasting kind. Here, Professore, and Students will be able to together the extent that has hitherto been found impossible. The experiment of "College Residence" has, I understand, been sufficiently Bombay, in Ahmedabad, and the here in Poone, to show the difficulties in its way, arising from native family habits are the serious the deeply rooted as to render them impossible of removal by the exercise in little tact. When I was in England, three years ago, I observed that rducated classes attach considerable importance to the system of resident studentship practised in the public schools and universities of that country; and being desirous that my country-men should enjoy the advantages of that system, (modified of course render it suited to India,) it particularly gratifying to me to know the experiment will be tried here on a large scale, and at time when the College of this City has staff of able and learned Professors, such as it never possessed at any previous time. Under their zealous care and assiduous attention, I trust that the general scope and usefulness of the Deccan College will be considerably cularged, and that the curver of improvement which has marked the management of the last few years will continue until the benefits of the education which will be imparted within the walls here to be erected, shall be felt in every Deccan village. I now, Honourable Sir, beg your Excellency to lay the First Stone of the Building of the future Deccan College.

[&]quot;The Decean College was opened on the 23rd March IIII "It is in the Gothic style of architecture, and has been planned to occupy three IIII of a quadrangle, the fourth side being left open to admit of free ventilation. It is provided, in the second south, is 300 feet in length, and 521 feet in extreme breadth; the two sides, or wings, are each 1535 feet long and 25 feet broad. It entrance is vanished, and the tower above, rising to a height of 106 feet, contains the Principal's ream, Rebord-room, and Idhrary. On the ground-flow of the Building are the main claimer with a Tutorn' many Laboratory, and Students' studies. As quadrangle, and

Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy, and Gentlemen—I have, on more than one provious occasion expressed the pleasure I feel — the head of this Government in seeing the wealth which has been accumulated by commercial enterprise, and the fruits of industry, carried on in Bombay under the protection of the British Crown, so nobly applied to benefit and adorn this ancient Maratha Capital.

This pleasure is enhanced when, mow, we recognise in the public benefactor a member of a family whose charities have become proverbial, and in whom we may regard might use of the gifts of Providence man hereditary virtue.

Some doubt has, I believe, been expressed as to the suitableness of this site, which is at present far removed from any other human habitation and from the busy precincts of the two turret stai. cases communicate with the upper floor. On the upper floor of the central building are Tutors' class-rooms, and the College Lall, which 70 × feet. The wings contain studies for ten students. In the centre of the is an octagonal bell turret. The construction is of random masonry, with out-stone quoins, and roof-covering corrugated iron. The Building has been completed a cost 2,45,968, of which Sir Januetji Jejesbhoy contributed one las. City, but I feel convinced me the Committees which selected this site exercised a wise discretion, not only because they have placed the College far from the temptations and distractions of the town, but because they seem to me to have designed what is most appropriate for an institution which is henceforth to be not merely the Poons College, but the College of the Decean. If the great future which I confidently anticipate for this College is ever realised, it must to draw its students from those who lived on the superstitious charity of the Peishwas. who are derive a precarious existence from whatever be earned by any pursuits those which involve mental bodily labour. Here, I trust, will be found the children of the old Deccan families, some being trained to occupy wisely and with public benefit positions secured to them by inheritance; others seeking the means of distinction in active professions, but not looking to the service of Government otherwise than ma profession of honor and distinction, peculiarly free from all those sordid motives of action which now, I fear, too often form its chief attraction.

Here the students will be able to devote, our European youths are wont to do, their whole attention and all their energies to study, without distraction by family cares or even by the pleasures of home, and their bodies will be invigorated by fresh air and healthy exercise, to which we attach much importance, but which are noften denied to the Indian student or the dweller in towns.

Your recollections, Sir, of an great English Colleges to which you have just alluded, will lead you to remark two most prominent features, which will not be found in Deccan College. It will have no chapel—it can have no Hall. I feel it a great privilege, Sir, to be able to speak to you and to those native gentlemen here present frankly and freely, on this subject, without I trust, any risk of misconception. You know that in not proposing to make religious teaching any part, as in most of the Colleges at home, of the studies of this College, are not actuated by any ignorance or want of feeling for the paramount importance of the religious element in every complete system of education. You know that among ourselves in England, however much may differ on points of religious belief, religion, in form or another, is the most vitally active principle in all that we do, or abstain from doing, whether ma community maindividuals, and that we could not, if we would, omit religion from anything which pretended to be a perfect system of education.

Still less will you suppose that, valuing religion as the foundation of all that — prize most, whether in our political or social economy, — withhold it from the students of this College from any narrow jealousy, — from any feeling lest it should weaken our position as the rulers of this country.

Apart from higher motives upon which I need not dwell, you know that whatever of power of knowledge we, as Englishmen, value most, has by the Crown and Parliament of England been freely placed within the reach of all Her Majesty's Indian subjects in any part of her empire. And could not, if we would, withhold from those who might be willing to learn them, those truths which we believe to be the great talisman of our as a nation.

The simple why that religious teaching, which every of us would regard of supreme importance in the education of his own child is necessarily omitted from the course of study in this College is that the parents of the scholars would not willingly permit their hildren to learn this most important part of education in the way and to the extent to which we, parents, would wish to teach it.

Some men, for whose opinions I feel a high respect, but with whom I cannot agree on this point, deem that me do wrong in not teaching here the whole of what me ourselves hold me necessary to a perfect education, and many, I know condemn that system of State education which has been handed down to by

Mr. Mountatuart Elphinstone, the venerated founder of this College and of the present educational system of Western India.

I cannot say I agree with such opinions, or that I think any fault fairly be found with Government if here, in Ireland, we acquiesce in the teaching of less than the whole circle of perfect education. If all that you as parents willing for your children to receive is here taught, if we housetly tell you that what is in taught is but part of the great whole, and does not contain what we Englishmen think the most vital and valuable part of a perfect education, I cannot see that we are in any way unfaithful to the most of truth.

The College which is to be accommodated in the Building in this day purpose to found, possessed, as the learned Principal has shown us, already a history and traditions of its old habitation, in the capital of the Peishwas which it has now outgrown.

I trust we may safely augur for it a future of prolonged usefulness and distinction in its habitation. The youth who will here come under the tuition of the Professors of the Deccan College will belong for the most part to which has during many centuries vindicated its title to rank among the most intellectual of all the tribes of Asia,—that Asia which was whother of intellect and learning at the time when the literature of Greece yet in its infancy.

Ages of comparative darkness and inactivity must not blind to the fact that the Brahminical students of this College was frace a pedigree more andoubted than any accorded by Western Heraldry, to those poets and sages from whom the travellers of twenty-three centuries ago carried to the Father of Grecian history the traces of earlier literature and civilisation. These Brahmin youths may still read in their own sacred language the writings of ancestors from whose speculations the great Western philosophers of Alexander's were not ashamed to gather wisdom. We have abundant reason to feel assured that however much a long course of misrule and consequent barbarism may have obscured the light, the true intellectual fire yet burns in the minds of this wonderful copportunity is only wanting to call out the political and administrative ability such as has been shown by Nana Farnavese, and still more lately by Raja Dinkar Rao, and to my knowledge, by some of the Hindu gentlemen whom I see here present this evening, and Western scholar who has tried the capacity of this race for the subtle attractions of science literature has ever expressed disappointment the result.

The scholars of this College will here, we may hope, re-kindle that light of ancient Sanskrit learning which meem for so many centuries burnt so brightly in the Vedic Colleges which have been alluded to by the learned Principal an having once flourished on the banks of the Godavery and Krishna, but of which the last embers hardly now survivo. It is, Sir, a singular coincidence which brings to College built at the expense of one of your race, and a chair maintained by the English Government, one of the greatest Sanskrit scholars of Gormany (Dr. Martin Haug.) to teach to Brahmin youth the ancient language of their Vedas.

Here too, Mr. Wordsworth has told us, they will apply themselves to studies as yet bardly known to the Hindu youth of the Deccan, the languages of ancient Rome, and I hope of Greece too, those famous off-shoots of the great family of languages to which Sanskrit has given its name, and which finds in Sanskrit its most perfect and fully organised form of expression.

Knowing what all European literature owes to Latin and Greek, I cannot but look for great results when the stores of ancient Greek and Roman literature shall become familiar to the educated minds of modern India.

But it is from the man perfect acquaintance with the modern literature of our own country that I augur the greatest results in the educatic of which this College will I hope be a principal seat. A study of our own poets and historians, our great writers on philosophical and political and physical science, and all their varied application to the arts of modern life, will, I assured, work changes of which our imaginations me now form but mindistinct idea.

We cannot doubt that intellect of this people has been already deeply stirred by contact with a civilisation and literature different from their own, so fertile in all the seeds of change and progress those of Western Europe, and I cannot help anticipating the manual brighter development of Hindu intellect when it feels the influence of those minds which have informed and directed the energies of the modern English people.

These are briefly the reasons, Sir, why I cannot but think that the work which you have in hand will be something than an episode in the history of a noble family—it will, I hope and believe, be an epoch in the intellectual history of great people.

CEREMONY OF LAYING THE CORNER-STONE.

The Hon'ble Mr. M. H. Scott (of Messrs Ritchie Steuart

Co.,) read the following address;—

May It Please Your Excellency—We have deemed it right to sak your Excellency — honor by your presence this day the commencement of those great public improvements which will, — trust, ere long, render this city worthy of her proud position as the metropolis of Western India.

The general architecture of our city has for years been standing proach, whether considered as regards the outward appearance of buildings merely, or as regards their safety and durability. The reproach trust is now about to be removed.

Your Excellency is aware of the circumstances which led to the erection of this Circle. The project originally emanating from our esteemed fellow-citizen, Mr. C. Forjett, and urged upon this community with all the energy by which every action of that gentleman was characterised, speedily gained favour. The preliminary arrangements very soon completed, and than years have sufficed to render the Elphinstone Circle almost an accomplished fact.

At the first meeting of the purchasers of land on the old Bombay Green, unanimously agreed give the Circle the name of the honored statesman who had ruled this Presidency so ably and who had served India so well during the trying times of the Mutiny, and whose loss we still deplore.

In giving to our work the name of this great and good Governor who ruled Bombay for six eventful years, seek to offer slight tribute of respect to his memory, but no poor efforts of ours an necessary to the remembrance of the same of Ephinstone.

The Buildings which are ising around us, and the more stately edifices which will shortly adorn Esplanade will serve to mark to all future generations the period of your Excellency's reign, a period of material progress and prosperity for Bombay which, we believe, will be found to be unexampled in the history of nations.

We now beg that your Excellency will honour our work by laying the Corner Stone.

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere replied = follows:-

I have felt it a duty to attend this occasion because, while recalling many recollections of the past, which we would not willingly have forgotten, it points to a future of great interest to all who may be in Bombay when we, who are now present, shall have passed away.

This pile of Buildings is to bear a name which for two generations has been regarded with just reverence throughout this Presidency. This is not the time to speak of Lord Elphinstone's claim to high place on the roll of Indian statesmen, we even to dwell that noble courtesy and high-bred regard for the feelings of others which lent such charm to his intercourse with society. It is enough to recall what Bombay him for those municipal and local improvements which alone needed to make her one of the fairest, she is not the greatest, cities of the East.

Western India, and speaks of Sir Bartle Frere's appointment as Governor of this Presidency thus;—

[&]quot;He (Sir Gr rge Clerk) has been succeeded by the experienced who who so well known smongst as the Commissioner who did so much for Sind, and who latterly, in the Council of the Governor-General of India, had taken leading part in passing the many useful and important which distinguished latter part of Lord Canning's administration.

Lord Elphinstone ouce told me that with regard to the Island of Bombay he had three great objects in view, which he trusted he might accomplish during his administration: they an ample supply of good water, the effectual drainage of the Town and Island, and the reclamation of all those marshes and pestilential foreshore surrounding Bombay, and the southern and western portions of Salsette, which medical science are no prejudicial to the health of this Island.

You all know how much of this noble purpose he effected.

The Vehar Water Works* would of themselves form a magnificent monument of the most successful administration. A perfect system of drainage,† though long delayed, is now I trust in course of successful execution. Much has been already done in which you, Sir, have had a prominent share, and much more will, I trust, be soon effected to render the marshes and foreshore of this Island and Salsette to longer a manual of malaria, but the seat of successful and of healthful agriculture.

Lord Elphinstone had, we you are aware, as almost filial regard for a city the name of which will now be connected with the fame of his great relative and predecessor, and I am imagine the feelings with which he would have witnessed this effectual commencement a series of edifices which, when complete, will, I hope, render the Island as striking in regard to architectural, is it already is in natural, beauty.

For be it remembered this is the first of those projected architectural works which spreading beyond the limits of old Fort, will, I trust, contribute to the permanent convenience and adornment of all the most frequented quarters of Island.

You have mentioned the share which I have had in this work; but it is only justice to my immediate predecessor to say, that Sir George Clerk had completed in the arrangements for sanctioning the erection of the Elphinstone Circle before he laid down the government. The circumstances that he is, though not among us, still in the artive service of Her Majesty in England, precludes my speaking of him with the same freedom as in the case of his lamented predecessor. I cannot, however, help reculling to you events which by lapse of time have become historical and which is within the living memory of but few here present.

It is difficult to convey to any who only knows the Panjaub as it is now adequate idea of the state of things in India immediately after the Cabul disasters.

We cannot now help thinking of the Panjaub as the province which forms as it were the great outwork of British India. Bich, peaceful, industrious, amply garrisoned, and not only aiding to preserve the peace of India, but sending forth its gallant soldiers to uphold the honor of England at the very gates of the capital of China.

While paying our just tribute to the genius and courage which have converted this great kingdom into messential element in the strength of British India, let me not forget the time which is still in the recollection of the of us, when the Panjaub hung like thunder-cloud North-Western frontier, while Pollock's Army strove to retrieve in Afighanistan the misfortunes of their ill-started predecessors. The great Seikh nation stood like greyhounds in leash eager contend for the mastery of India; wast and well disciplined army, of which a few years after proved the prowess, intervened between distant forces and our Indian Frontier.

At that time, it is no exaggeration to say that the temper and action of the whole Seikh nation depended on one man, and that man kept them to their treatics, and awed them into mattitude of passive watchfulness, not by legions at his back, nor by any hereditary claim their obedience, but by sheer force of character, by the respect which even the wild beast of the forest pays to flinching courage, and which the least civilised of mankind feel for unswerving honour and fidelity to duty.

It always seemed to me afit ending of such service that after making standing sentinel and our North-Western Frontier, Sir George Clerk finished his Indian career in devising plans for adorning or improving the commercial facilities of the great capital of Western India.

For let mover forget, that all this prosperity that around is mainly due to that wide-spread peace and security to which services, such - those Sir George Clerk rendered in 1842, and Lord Elphinstone rendered within your own recollection in 1857-58, have so largely contributed. The same harbour, the man natural facilities, have always existed. It is because God has blessed with peace, because the trader can follow unmolested bis peaceful calling throughout India, that this wealth is now pouring in on Bombay; and I feel that it is a good augury for the permanence of this state of things when I we you choose as the title of this great pile, a name which recalls like Lord Elphinstone all that is best in the Government of British India, and all that is noblest in the character of the services of that Government. I feel that while you admire his lofty integrity, his generous and unswerving devotion to public duty, and his utter forgetfulness of all sordid personal advantage, you have set before our public men a model, the very tempt to imitate which must be a fair guarantee for successful service of the State.

We are often warned that this prosperity cannot last, that it is hollow and transient, and will leave Bombay after a brief period of inflated prosperity much as she had been for centuries previous.

God forbid that I should tell you to despise such warning urge presumptuous reliance on the present.

No prudent man expect such tide of prosperity to continue without check, and when the check comes it will doubtless overwhelm many who have nothing to trust to but the favouring breath of fortune—who have not the training to steer their bark aright, and like all who meddle with what is not their proper business must sooner or later incur failure and disgrace.

But I would fain augur better things for the great permanent establishments connected with the commerce of Bombay, which will here, I hope, find their home, and which you. Sir, so worthily represent; and I would rather trust the anticipations of my reason which tells me that if we are blessed with a continuance of peace and general security as our railways penetrate further into the country, and as our steamers multiply on our coasts, what we now will be but the preenr-or of a much greater development of commercial activity, and that we may hope for many years to come to witness such a steady increase of connecreid prosperity as will require wast extension of such noble buildings as this of which we now lay the corner stone. Of this at least I was sure. When I look to the way in which the men who will live and labour here are employing their wealth, when I consider the example set - by Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier (whom I am surry not to see here to-day, and whose absence I regret the more, because I believe that, without his aid this Circle would never have been begun), by the Jamsetiis, the Sankarsetts and Sassoons, the Premchands, and so many others of me great merchants, I cannot but feel that what will, History will write up the generation who built this pile .- "These KNEW HOW WORTHILY TO USE THE GIFTS WHICH GOD MAIN THEM."

The Zate Mr David Sassoon.

[Bombay, 14th December 1864.]

A public meeting* of the Inhabitants of Bombay was held in the Town Hall, for the purpose of voting a Statue to the venerable head of the Jewish Community—Mr. David Sassoon, who died at Poons on the 5th November 1864. His Excellency the Governor presided on the occasion.

HIS EXCELLENCY said that before putting any resolution to the moeting, he wished to observe that his presence there was due to two circumstances -one the fact that Mr. David Sassoon was removed beyond the reach of our praise or blame, and that it only remained for us to take care that the good example he had left behind him was not lost to posterity. The second reason which made him feel it to be a duty to attend the meeting was that Mr. David Sassoon, though he never held public office, was emphatically a public character, and consequently one whose acts and whose memory could not be a matter of indefference to the Government. His Excellency then proceeded to notice Mr. Sassoon's claims to be considered a public character on the triple ground. First-That to Mr. Sassoon owing the present position of the Jewish community in Bombay as a body of great commercial importance and influence. Second-As a founder of benevolent institutions who had evinced not only rare liberality but also great judgment and discrimination. His Excellency then referred to the terms of the Telegram in which Mr. J.R. Morgan. the Revenue Commissioner, who as Collector of Poons had long known Mr. Sassoon, reported his death - Government, - "in whom the poor of Poons had lost their best friend." Third-As

This meeting was held in the requisition of the Inhabitants of Bombay on the 2nd November 1864, for the purpose of affording aid to the sufferers by the terrible Cyclone which took place at Calcutta on the 5th October 1864. In Jamsetji Jejsebboy, who presided on this occasion, observed:

I especially address the Kative Community, I me show the have for ever cast in our I with the great British Government, that we will stand by that Government with our fortunes I we would, I need I with lives, let us join with Calcutta in healing the wounds of those who have bouse I home, by the dire calamity I has pleased I to inflict upon her."

been proposed to so of late years, Bombay will speedily be filled with statues." Let - for the sake of argument anticipate this result, and consider whether it is in itself an evil to be dreaded. We have here wery large increasing and rich city, such with as in Europe is, if not a capital city, would possess | the principal characteristics of capital. Let us recall to mind the principal features which strike a stranger in any European town of 800,000 inhabitants, and then sider whether - have, or are likely to have during the next century. any superfluity of architectural or sculptural ornament in Bombay. His Excellency observed that the beauties and noticeable features of the place are due to the bounty of nature, and that we owe extremely little we yet to art, or the hand of man, and that the number of buildings and statues which would appear striking in a second or third rate capital in Europe would be utterly lost if fairly distributed over the great areas and among the teeming crowds of this large Indian city. Be it remembered that sculnture and architecture inseparably connected, and that any large number of buildings of any architectural pretensions, without a great amount of sculpture simple impossibility. Let = look at the examples of any but our Mahomedan predecessors to the works of the Assyrians or Egyptians, the Greeks or Etruscans, the Romans or their successors in Northern and Western Europe, we find sculpture, monumental and historical sculpture, the portraiture in stone, of min as he lived when any great building was first designed and erected is accepted by usage m a necessity in the architecture of great buildings, and the ornamentation of great cities. His Excellency said he knew of European town which had any pretension to the character of even m provincial or district capital, in which this truth has not been practically recognized by the experience of centuries and where the visitor will not find the local worthies of former days commemorated according to the best and of local artists, in such materials as the local means permitted. But, it may be said that this example would be safe follow, if could only our local worthies-if could find deserving of such durable tion! Here again let - look to the example of other people, other ages, which, in such matters we may safely follow. There be no doubt, that in the sculptures which adorned the public places and buildings of the Assyrians and Egyptians, the portraiture of the very men who reigned, and fought, who hunted, who built, who worshipped, we least arrived and the hereditary lineaments of conquerors and conquered, - they walk in the procession of the victor, may still be traced in many a people around us. Let us then come to modern examples, let menquire who were thus commemorated in the great provincial cities of Greece and Rome? whose effigies do antiquarians disinter from the ruins of some flourishing Roman colony in Asia or Africa, or from the forum of Pompeii Horoulaneum? Are they not the local celebrities and worthics whose virtues and good deeds we find commemorated in sculpture but of whose claims to the honour, the great history of the world bears little or no record? Let us look nearer our own English home. From the date when wealth and civilisation rendered monumental sculpture possible up to a comparatively recent period, how abundant is the monumental commemoration! Not only of our great historical statesmen and heroes, but of ____ local celebrities, let ___ enter any of our churches and civil halls, an any unaltered market-place of our provincial capitals in England, Germany or France, and there we shall find that our ancestors of the middle ages, recorded in their manumental sculpture merely the emperor, the king, the great statesman, but the good knight whose greatest public act was to build a eastle or lead a few dozen retainers to the wars. the good lady who founded a school - an hospital, the good abbott who embelished the church, and the good burgess, a citizen who built the market-cross, or won, by honest thrift, the means of founding schools where the youth of future generations might be trained to follow his own steps in the paths of civic industry and charity. What, then, is the deduction that we should draw alike from the examples of Greece and Rome, and of those times in modern Europe when the arts most flourished? It is simply this. That in adorning me Eastern city, we should combine with the best architecture we me obtain, the best sculpture we can command, to commemorate our most worthy citizens. But it may be asked, in what form shall we commemorate them? And here it may be admitted that the peculiarities of costume might present some difficulty to the artist, but IIIs Excellency thought, which might not be overcome when we considered how completely similar difficulties had been vanquished by our great artists who had to deal with the yet more difficult costume of modern Europe. His Excellency referred to the statue* in the Town Hall, that of Sir Jamsetji Jejechhoy, I noble work of art every way worthy of the great artist's high reputation—which presented Sir Jamsetji precisely in he lived among us and as we would desire to recall him to our memories. In this matter of costume, as in every thing else connected with sculpture, His Excellency observed that truth to nature was the qualification, for the absence of which no artistic skill could atone.

His Excellency Sir Bartle Frere said he experienced great pleasure in presiding on an occasion like the present, and, doubtless the satisfaction that he felt in the opening of the Thul Ghaut which would throw open uninterrupted the vast traffic of Western India, was felt in the same degree by every one present. He recollected it being asserted that this Road would pay even for the bridging of it, as well = minute recorded by the late Hon'ble Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone, forty-two years ago. that _____ or later the old method of traffic _____ the Thul Ghaut must be abandoned, and a improved substituted in its place. The idea of a road across the Thul Ghaut when first mentioned as absolutely scouted by men of no mean engineering talont; and it me not till Colonel Kennedy had pronounced the feasibility of the undertaking that the public became interested in the matter. How far Colonel Kennedy was justified in his opinion, the beautiful Ghaut through which they had just come, comfortably scated in a railway train, testified. That bold project, however, had yet to be grappled with, and it was not till the late Mr. James Berkley finally dealt it his touch that the idea of railroad through the Ghauts aprang into an existing fact. It then that embankments were formed, tunnels cut through, stupendous cuttings effected, the rails speedily laid, and the entire road over the Ghants finally completed in the beautiful and grand they had just witnessed in coming up. In a few short years the great Roman road which me deemed the very perfection of road-making has to be abandoned, and those precipitous heights spanned across and barriers cut through until finally railroad is laid over those Ghauts which, at me period were deemed unapposchable even by a service track road. In a work of the former description, one single fault would have marred its effective construction, and it shewed how much depended upon the workmen engaged upon such a difficult task; for had there been less heartiness, less unanimity, the vast design, that gigantic undertaking, would have crumbled to pieces in utter failure; but Measrs. Wythes and Jackson, with a spirit and zeal in the undertaking which would have done honour to any nobleman, brought it to the successful termination which they had that day witnessed | although very after they had commenced the work it was perfectly clear that it would be anything but profitable undertaking to them. But with a kindness of spirit they pursued what they began in the midst of the precarious position of their countrymen in India, until | last they behold the great work of their hands completed to its uttermost; surmounting all barriers, overcoming all difficulties, and connecting the country with a railroad through obstacles hitherto deemed impossible to remove. His Excellency, therefore, proposed the health of those eminent engineers who although not present, were nevertheless, personated by Mr. R. W. Graham the Chief Engineer, well the contractors of the works who were present with them that day.

The Yombay Strangers' Friend Society.

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere said ;-

Gentlemen,—I have been asked, before taking the chair, to say a few words — the subject which has brought us together to-day. I — quite certain that the attendance here this evening does not at all represent the amount of interest which is taken in this institution by the European inhabitants of Bombay; because I feel quite sure that if the objects of this society were generally understood, there are very few Europeans in this island who would consider themselves absolved from the duty of coming here and taking an active part in the proceedings of this society, and give to it their heartiest support. I confess it appeared to me, when I heard that it proposed to hold a public meeting in support of this society at this particular season, that the managers of the society had very great faith in the strongth of their cause; because we all know that when we ranks are very much thinned by departures to Europe or to various parts of Judia, and the climate is so much against us, how difficult it is to obtain a large attendance. At the same time, however, I believe it was felt by the managers of this society that they would not be doing their duty if they deferred laying before the European community an account of their stewardship-of what had been previously done; and that if they delayed to make the European community acquainted with the state of their funds, there was possibility of their being obliged to contract their operations. Among the gentlemen who would have been here this evening, if time had permitted, was the Hon'ble Mr. C. J. Erskine, who unable to be at the meeting in consequence of his preparing to embark that night for the Coast. I believe, that though our numbers this evening me not large, yet we have a tolerable representation here of every class of the community; and I only trust that another object which the society has in view will be attained by this evening's proceedings, and that is to make generally known the existence of this society and the objects which it has in view. In such a fluctuating state of society - have it is next to impossible to get up m continuous interest in any institution however useful m however meritorious; and while we are obliged, as we are in the present state of this island, to put am most valuable publie institutions in all kinds of out-of-the-way places, it is still more difficult to attract individuals to meetings of this kind. I see among us to-day many gentlemen who could not have been present in Bombay with time when the discussion took place which led to the original institution of the acciety. It will be in the recollection of some of the gentlemen now present that shortly after the commencement of the manner rise in prices it was found that the first class to feel it most acutely were the lower orders of Europeans; and it fell upon them severely because many of them were badly off and had me resources to back upon; and the greater number were pressed so closely, that they were actually brought the borders of starvation. This circumstance attracted the attention of several of the leading members of the commercial community, and they took up the question with that energy for which they so remarkable. That discussion which I trust will bear permanent fruits-was conducted with a great deal of ability by of the gentlemen connected with the Government service and some econocited with commerce; and the result was one of important practical nature, the foundation of this society. For three years past the society has practically had this effect, it has shown that it men impossible for any European to say that he was without the means either of getting employment or subsistence in Bombay; and it has also accomplished a very useful object in bringing out some of the difficulties in our laws about dealing with European vagrancy. + This is a very beief statement of what the society has already done. The report which will be read to you this evening, and will be put into the hands of all who interexted in the matter, will give you further information, and I think it will satisfy all who are now present that it is owing to the exertions of the managers of this society that its objects have been m usefully and honestly carried out. The lapse of time which has removed so many gentlemen who assisted in founding the society, has also removed a great many others who subscribed to it; and as is always the case in institutions of this nature, it has also become necessary, not only to arouse, but to keep up the public interest in it to obtain a more extended and continuous pecuniary support. I feel sure, that this will not be wanting when the object of this society is fully understood; for it is one which comes home to every one of us. This society is emphatically an European poor man's society There is not a soul among us in the European community of Bembay who is not less directly interested in this matter, whether - may be employed - the electric telegraph, the railway, in commerce, fighting by sea - by land, as shipmasters = as shipowners, as governors or = commanders of armios. I need not tell you where we should all be if it were not for the poer European who is in the bottom of the scale in this country, and on whom rests emphatically the military power, the commercial prosperity, and to a great extent, the artistic advancement of this country. And when I remind you, that the object of this society is to provide for this class, to provide for them against want, which is never far from their doors-and when it does come they are totally unprovided for it-I need not tell you that there is not a single person among us-whatever may be his stay in India, whether for a few months or for many years-who is not directly or indirectly concerned in the prosperity of this society. It is the only which had for its object that which I have described—the of destitute Europeans: and I trust that every one will consider it a duty not only to aid in supporting it himself, but also to make its objects and its claims known to every one with whom he is socially connected.

Proposed by the Hon'ble G. Foggo seconded by Major J. H. Henderson, that a cardial vote of thanks be given to Taxellency the Governor for presiding this evening.

His Excellency in acknowledging this resolution said he begged to make two observations with regard to a remark which had fallen from the Rev. Mr. W. K. Fletcher, than whom no knew better or had had a longer experience of the state of the poor Europeans of Bombay, or was more entitled to speak with authority on the subject. He had described the operations of the society as experiment. They might safely say, however, that upon the whole it had been a very successful experiment. Mr. A.T. Crawford had said that it mecessary to provide for the female portion of the poor Europeans of this island. That difficulty which every of us wished to remedied, but it must to a great extent depend upon the extent of the support which the society received from the public. Hitherto they had been content with supporting the bread-winner, and leaving him to provide for his family; but he trusted that this subject would receive the attention of the large and influential committee which had just been appointed. On the previous day, the Commander-in-Chief and himself had visited the Parsi Sanitarium at Colaba," which was provided for the poor classes of that community, and if persons would only recommend the claims which the Strangers' Friend Society possesses, should soon get a building like that for the poor classes of our own countrymen. Mr. Fletcher and some of the other speakers had alluded to the difficulty of dealing with Europeans who munable or unfit to remain in this country. How to deal with this class me not merely a question of money, because it no doubt required legislation well. It as a very difficult subject, and it was one in which he as member of the Government might say they would be pretty sure to go wrong unless they were systained by the independent opinion of the Europeans of the community. It was only by unofficial well as by official omployers of labour considering the question in all its bearings, by which we could take any successful steps in dealing with the European vagrants of this country. The gentlemen who had had the direction of this society seemed to him to have overlooked one act of justice in the programme of this evening's proceedings. It had made no mention of the labour of the executive committee, and he hoped the meeting would pardon any irregularity if he asked them to pass an unanimous vote of thanks to the Honorary Secretary, Mr. F. M. Davidson, and to the members of the executive committee.

His Excellency then thanked the meeting for the vote of thanks which they had awarded to him; and he begged to move another vote of thanks to the Honorary Secretary and the Executive Committee.

Merwanji Pramji Panday, Justice II the Peace, constructed the Parsi Sanitarium II Colaba at a cost of about six lacs of rupers. Sir 和. A. Mansfield, G. C. S. I., K. C. B. 🕫

[Bombay, M February 1865.]

A Farewell Entertainment significant to His Excellency Sir William Rose Mansfield, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., Commander-in-chief of the Bombay Army, in the occasion of his appointment in Commander-in-chief of the Forces in India. The banquet took place at Government House, Malabar Point.

His Excellency the Governor in proposing the teast of the evening, said:-

Gentlemen,- It is with very mingled feelings that I ask you to join me in drinking the bealth of your guest this evening, His Excellency Sir William Rose Mansfield. I believe there is

" His Excellency Lieutement General Sir William Munafold, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., resigned the Command of the Bombay Army on the 14th March 1863, and the Gov. rement of Bombay issued the following General Order; —

The services of Sir William Manefeld, previous to his taking command of the Bombay Army, are so recent and so well known, that it is unnecessary in recapitulate them. They have been so frequently honoured with the notice and approval of the Vicercy of India, of the Parliament of Rugland, and of Her Majesty the Queen that may comment in their eminent character would be superfluous.

But the Governor of Bombay in Council in notifying His Excellency's resignation of his present office, tenders to him the acknowledgments of Government for his unremitting and successful exertions whilst in command of the Bombay Army im Improve its efficiency.

nobody here present at the table, and I believe there - very few in India, who boast of so long acquaintance with Sir William Mansfield as I can myself, for I had the honour of seeing him first, - the day when he left Sandburst, distinguished by the highest honors which could possibly be obtained at that time by any student at that great military college. The promise which was then given by the boy was very speedily fulfilled by the man, and it me not long before Captain Mansfield became known in India ... of the best and most promising regimental efficers in Her Majesty's service. He served with very marked distinction in the war, in the great campaign in the Suiledge and in Northern India, where he found himself associated with one of the most remarkable soldiers of modern times; a www who knew than any general of our age wherein lay the strength of the British army, the British infantry. Sir Colin Campbell soon discovered the distinguished worth of the young soldier who was at his side. I have been told by one who knew them well, that when Bir Colin Campbell was called upon to discuss one of the many difficult problems which he had to solve in the and of the warproblems of the greatest military and political importance—he would say with that grasp of apprehension which distinguished him. "I sure I am right, -- I know I am right--but I cannot put it paper: but there is Mansfield, who knows as well as I do, and he will put it on paper for me." I believe it me of these very papers which found their way into the hands of the statesman and soldier who belonged to the school of the great Duke of Wellington, and which gave to English statesmen, during the time of the Crimean war, their first impression of Sir William's abilities in a very different field. You will recollect that when we found ourselves face to face with one of the greatest of modern powers, and when we were associated in ____ of the greatest wars of the generation to which belong, with our good allies the French-I say you will remember the great difficulties which me felt in combining the political and military duties which were | that time separated. They were separated; for the military was one of the things of the past generation which belonged to the Peninsular school, and the political was in the hands of one who was, certainly, the greatest foreign and diplomatist of which England boset; so that it was difficult to reconcile these duties, and to bring the stern and unbending nature of Lord Stratford De Redcliffe into relation with the other branches of the administration which were employed in conducting the war. this difficulty that led the Government of the day to look to Colonel Mansfield, and they called upon him to to Lord Redcliffe's side as his Military Secretary. Such . nomition he judged of only by its results. When returned, to him was confided of the most important diplomatic nosts which it was in the power of the Government of the day to bostow-that at Warsaw-but before he was able to show how well he could appreciate the difficulties which attended it, and how well he was able to overcome them in the position he filled, he was called upon to enter upon the next sten in his career. We all familiar with that story, which will live to the latest day of English history as one marked by the saddest events, and distinguished by the brightest heroism. We - all familiar with what Sir Colin Campbell replied to the summons to proceed to India and take charge of the armies in the field when the Mutiny broke out. To civilians it seems a very simple thing to say "I will go out I will put myself on board the next steamer and go out and command the armies in India." But a soldier knows there is something required than that. When that summons me given to Sir Colin, it was known that more of our most important arsenals more in the hands of a relentless foe; it was known we had to look I England for sid, and during the days that intervened between the to Lord Clyde and his proceeding in his great mission, he had to consider some of the weightiest problems that a soldier and statesman can be called upon to discuss. I do not think any one me fully understand the sense of relief it brought to the great Governor-General who then ruled ____ India to find such ___ eminent man at his side in Calcutta. I know, that when Sir Colin [&]quot;Viscount Stratford De Redeliffe, P. C., G. C. B., was Ambassador at Constantinople from 1824 to 1829, and from 1841 to 1858. Sir W.

Campbell and the chief of his staff, and those soldiers who will live in the hearts and memories of Englishmen mexemplars of virtue, patriotism, and soldierly courage, Sir James Outram and his colleagues-when they looked round them and me how little was all the military aid they had at the base of their operations in Indiacan understand the difficulty they had to surmount. How that aid was supplied it would be too long attempt to tell you, because the story would be only the story of the Mutiny, and the story of how the Mutiny was suppressed. The details of it are fresh in recollection, and you will all remember how Lord Clyde himself, and how those who spoke an that memorable occasion when the thanks of Parliaments were returned to Sir William Mansfield, all dwelt on the aid which the General Commandingin-Chief, and the Governor-General had received from the tried sagacity, the experience, the great military talent of the chief of the staff. You all remember how proud me felt when such man and called upon to command the armies of this Presidency. We milliving too near that time to be able thoroughly to judge of what he has effected for us; but this a can all see, that we have passed, during the five years of his command, through m great revolution, and that the army of Bombay has come out of that revolution in a state completely different from what it before that revolution commenced-and I say with confidence that it would be impossible to put it in a more officient state than it is at the present moment. There was many here who can judge well of the truth of what I say that if Her Majesty were to command in to put the army of Bombay on a war footing and increase it to double and quadruple its present strength, it could be done with perfection and celerity of detail which would be unmatched in any army of the same size, and that all this has been quietly and peacefully effected, we owe to our guest of this evening. But it is not only in his command of the army of Bombay that we have had reason to feel and appreciate the value of his administrative ability, for I do not believe there a single branch of the civil administration, that does not bear traces of his talent and his unfailing attention to every part of the duties of his office. Those duties more important than fall to the lot of a general, in the pure European sense of the word. They require to a very great, to wery high degree indeed, all the abilities of ustatesman and usm certain that I only speak the feeling of my colleagues, and of all who have been associated with us in the Government, when I say that - shall entertain the most cordial recollection of the aid have received from Sir William Mansfield on many of the most important questions that have been confided to War You yourselves know what he has done for Bombay how much he has assisted in revising the obsolute system of fortification, and more than that, in laying out plans which I hope we may see some day in good progress for beautifying and extending the town. You and I who have been in the habit of resorting to Poous will regret that he has been here amongst us a solitary man, for all of will remember the frank courtonies with which he presided over there, and if Lady Mansfield is not here to receive our congratulations = the high post to which Her Majesty has summoned her husband, - hope that they will live together for many years in their new position m happily as they have lived in Bombay, and if we live to meet Sir William Mansfield again, it will be with added lustre to the reputation he has already earned, with undiminished health, and with all the blessings which prosperity and bring. I beg you will join me in drinking with all the honours, the health of me distinguished guest-

His Excellency Sir William Manefield replied, When heart wery full, the tongue is very weak, and in returning my heartfelt thanks for the great honour you have done me this evening, I can only say, that I difficulty in expressing myself. And further it is no light thing return thanks for a toast like the present, serving at I have been during five years in the Bombay Precidency, and receiving such assistance as I have received in the performance of my duties, well as at having been met with the greatest cordiality from the highest to lowest. I came among you a perfect stranger five years ago, and during that period

I have had the honour of being associated, with three different Governors of this Presidency. First, there was the lamented and heroic Lord Elphinstone; man who may be called heroic, for he stood with unflinching and unblushing brow in the presence of that catastrophe which broke was India, and on that occasion Lord Elphinstone showed himself a fit condjutor to the great Lord Canning. The _____ of Lord Elphinstone with whom I had the honour of being associated = a colleague was the good, the chivalrous Sir George Clerk. He is watching from afar over the destinies of this Presidency which he loved so well. But he had a difficult task to perform; and his task was to bring back this country from a state of war and insurrection to a state of peace. His task was a difficult one and a thunkless one, for he and ordered to cut down the expenditure, and he set to do it and did it. This task he performed with a generous integrity to every who served under him, and notwithstanding the unpopular nature of the task he left this country with the good feeling of every one in the service. After Sir George Clerk left, your Excellency came to this Presidency, and I think this occasion I may cast aside the trammels of office and here offer my thanks I the man as I do to the Governor. Greatly as I - obliged to your Excellency for the eulogy with which you have proposed this toast, still I say that on every occasion with which I have been associated with you in this Government, it has always given to me the greatest pleasure to work under you and to carry out your orders. The task of commanding the army has been made easy to me, and it would have been impossible to have brought it to a successful conclusion, if there had not been the greatest cordiality between the highest civil authority and his colleagues. With respect to the other point to which your Excellency has been pleased to allude, I can only say that the man must have been insensible and dull indeed who did not and appreciate the great practical improvements which have been going on with the view of carrying forward the interests of this community. During these five years we have witnessed a revolution in the whole will of society here. First there was the political change, then there was the change in the law, and then there was the commercial spirit at work, producing a change the full extent and course of which we me hardly yet appreciate; and I think this community may be congratulated in having a Governor who is only able to grasp the character of the revolution but who is able to direct it.

CEREMONY OF LAYING CORNER-STONE OF THE NEW CHANCEL

After the Rev: Mr Fletcher read the report, His Excellency Sir Bartle Frere said:--

My Lord Bishop, Ladies, and Gentlemen-Before belalf of the Trustees, and on this occasion, asking you to lay the cornerstone of this new building I would venture upon a few remarks. It has been thought by the Trusteen that these would come better from one of the congregation, than could be admitted in their own address. The brief history of the Church which the Reyd, Mr. Fletcher has just read has told us how it has increased from the of the parish church to that of the Cathedral, and why it is that what was found sufficient for this parish is not sufficient for this see. He has told us how the present building is insufficient for the daily and weekly uses of the cathedral services, and have bow it is quite unequal in space to those requirements which are continually coming upon it, when it is necessary that your Lordship should meet all the clergy of your diocese in addition to that of the usual congregation. When this Church founded, it comprised all that was comprised in the English man of the East. Within sight of this spot warm to be seen the boundaries of sometimes hostile tribes which hemmed the English territory in every ride. During the century and half which has since clapsed those boundaries have greatly increased.

The increased boundaries of your Lordship's are now hundreds of miles distant, and would give a traveller a journey of 2,000 miles in some directions. In the time and in same degree, the population, the commerce, and the wealth of this island, have increased also. What was but a small port where church, which they would gladly pay by the their disposal; and there me many others who have a deep and abiding interest in this work—men who have had, like the centurion of old, founded their hopes in religion, and many who have had their hearts touched by a saving grace. I trust this feeling will and deepen, and that there may be many of those who mow wandering, when this Church is finished, may be brought together in fold in Christ. It is in this trust and this connection that the inhabitants of this city are permitted to do this work; and may be permitted to say that I hope pecuniary aid will be forthcoming, in order that it may be brought to a prosperous conclusion; and now in behalf of the Trustees of this congregation, I now ask your Lordship to lay the corner-stone of the New Chancel of this Church.

The Lord Bishop of Bombay (the Right Rev. John Harding, D. D.). concluded by saying that "before I proceed to the duty imposed upon me, I have a duty of a different kind to perform. I beg to convey to your Excellency behalf of the Church the thanks which it owes to you for the interest you have taken in this work, and not only this work only. but in every other work. Wherever your has been in India, you have left behind you marks of consummate skill in the discharge of your duties to the State, in devoted attachment to the service of your God, and un carnest desire to increase the welfare of those around you, in each and all of those relations. I have also to return to the Trustees and in the gentlemen associated with them our thanks for the unwearied interest they have taken in the work entrusted to their hands. If I may single out among them to whom our thanks am especially due, it is to our Senior Chaplain (the Rev : Mr. W. K. Fletcher) for the zeal and energy with which he has thrown into this undertaking; and with feelings of thankfulness to God for his mercy to us, I will now proceed to the discharge of the duty you have imposed upon me, of laying the foundation-stone of the New Chancel."

THE Soldiers' Industrial Exhibition at Poons was opened by His Excellency the Governor of Bombay.

Sir Charles Van Straubenzee addressed His Excellency, thanking him the name of the Committee for kindly consenting to open the Exhibition, the personal interest he had shown in the matter, and also, the head of Government, for granting adonation equal in amount to the private subscription list.

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frore then said, that it with great pleasure he attended - this occasion, - he looked upon an exhibition of this nature as ___ which ___ of far more importance than the mere eight of many useful and well-made articles were set out in the room. He looked on it m a great sten towards the amelioration of the position of the British soldier. He sold enough to remember the time when "to go for soldier" looked upon as going to ruin by the fellow villagers of the new recruit. He knew it then the opinion of many men-and for whose opinions he then held a great respect—that a soldier should be a good fighting and nothing else— that the manne you lowered him to become a machine, the perfect soldier he became. Nothing and done towards his moral bonefit. Long service man looked to as a necessity. and the poor worn-out invalid who returned to the home of his youth with many scars, and memall pension, and neither in a moral or in any other aspect incentive to the youth of his neighbourhood to join the ranks. Many present could corroborate His Excellency's statements. The first thing which led to malteration in such matters was the Crimean war; then it was found that mere machines, however well they could fight, could not help themselves in other ways—they could not pitch their tents, m turn their hands to snything beyond the actual fighting portion of the business; fight they did, and iii right well; but nothing

Now it was to improve such . . of matters that, amongst other things, regimental workshops were instituted in order that the men might be enabled to use their spare time to some profit. Short terms of service had the effect of making who looked to the future consider, that while they learning and doing their duty - soldiers they - forgetting the trade of their youth, which in their more mature years they would again have to look to for a livelihood. They therefore auxious to leave after the first period of service had been got over, whereas those were the very men whom Government wished to retain. Now the workshops gave these men the opportunity they wanted; they could carry on their trade and improve in it-while in the meantime they were carning their pennions as good soldiers, it would them in their old age. Another benefit, which His Excellency pointed out as likely to arise from the regimental workshops, for the young, the boys of the soldiers. In England, who has not seen in a village some of the sharpest lads always hanging about the workshop of the carpenter, blacksmith, &c. and having a finger in the work? Here where it was but too often the difficulty, of the soldier-parent to know what to do with his these workshops were the very thing, and he had no doubt the youths would out their finger in the one or burn them in the other, - their fellow-country youth in England did. His Excellency in conclusion, tendered not only his own, but the thanks of Government to Sir Charles Straubenzer, the Commander of the Forces, and the members of the Committee for what they had done to further this excellent object, and congratulated them and their most onergetic Secretary, Major Hassard, m the which had attended their efforts.

CEREMONY OF LAYING IIII FOUNDATION-STONE.

[Poons, III August 1865.]

Sir Alexander Grant, the Director of Public Instruction, read a statement containing the history of the origin and progress of the College after which His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frore said.—

Sir A. Grant, Ladies, and Gentlemen;—We have in the first place to perform this day a duty of justice and gratitude in acknowledging the noble benefaction of Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier Readymoney, to whom an it that this building when completed may be something better than a commodious shed. I greatly regret that the state of his health prevents Mr. Cowasji from being here present to-day to receive in person acknowledgments for his liberality. But his absence has at least an

This Building was completed early . at an expenditure of Rs. 1.81.647. of which Rs. 50,000 contributed by Mr. Cowasji Johanghier Readymoney. On the ground floor are three Lecture-rooms Drawing-room, Laboratory, Instrument and Photograph on either eide of the main Hall, which # 62' x 50', rising uninterruptedly to a beight of 42 feet. advantage, that it permits me to speak more unreservedly than I should otherwise have ventured to do of sobligations him, and to refer to one or two circumstances connected with his gift which - characteristic of him that I cannot forbear them to call them to your recollection. Thus, it will I know interest many here present to be reminded that his offer of . 5,000 towards building this College - coupled with the gift of a similar sum to aid the Strangers' Friend Society in building a home in Bombay for destitute Europeans.* This, Sir, myou know is not by any marked moditary instance of his liberality, and the gift marked by other traits me less characteristic of the practical business-like habits, without which such liberality must too often fail to its object. The large sums he contributed were paid into the Tressury soon he aware that his benefaction had been accepted. On this, as on all other occasions, Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier was anxious to justify the thoroughly English surname which he had chosen for himself, and acted in accordance with what ____ the old boast of the great native merchants of Bombay, and will, I trust, ever continue to be the practice of all that deserve to be numbered among that honourable body "that their word was as good = their bond."

You know how much we all regret the delay which has occurred in carrying out Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier's benevolent intentions. It is untreessary that I should explain all the mischances and misunderstandings which have caused this delay. I will only say that I am sure that to no me have they caused greater regret than to Mr. E. I. Howard, your able and accomplished predecessor in the office of Director of Public Instruction, whom I should have been glad to have had the pleasure of seeing here to-day to receive in person the expression of me thanks to him and Mr. Henry Coke, for their exertions in establishing this College.

The obstacles which have m long retarded the commencement of the work are now, I trust, finally overcome; we have here a very beautiful plan for a very commodious building designed by Mr.

Trubshawe, and I feel under Captain Melliss's charge every justice will be done to it which professional skill, taste, and energy united can But before laying the foundation stone, I would say a few words to the branch of teaching to which the Building when completed will be devoted.

By a happy accident it has come to pass that Civil Engineering has in two or three generations risen from the rank of a profession which concerned itself with a purely empirical art, to that of a scientific profession, and this has been attained without any of the systematic development which usually attends the establishment of a distinct scientific profession. We have some of m seen, m at least heard, in our youth of some fathers of the Engineering profession in England, who, without any advantages of birth or education raised themselves to the highest rank . Civil Engineers, and we in England apt to forget that it only an accident, the novelty of the profession, and the favourable combination of circumstances in manufacturing and mining districts, which enabled a few some of uncommon natural force of character and great natural genius to take advantage of the unusual opportunities presented to them, and to attain that rare union of science and practical experience which are required in the perfect engineer, thus reversing the usual and almost universal rule of training in all professions, which requires theoretical science to be first learnt and then to be perfected by practice.

We in England are apt with these striking examples of our Brindleys and our Stephensons before us to forget that it is only in the infancy of a scientific profession that this can happen, and that it will be hereafter an difficult for a man who has not been regularly and scientifically trained to the profession to make his way to the front rank of engineers, as it now-a-days would be for the empirical practitioner, however able as experienced, to become a leader in the noble profession of Surgery. But even in England we are as awakening to the necessity for a thorough scientific education as the groundwork of a civil engineer's career, and this necessity has been long recognised in France and Ireland and in other countries.

Here in India our position has long been one of peculiar destitution of all indigenous means of instruction, and have been almost entirely dependent on England for engineering talent and training in all but the most subordinate and purely practical branches of the profession. Not that there are any natural difficulty in obtaining the necessary raw material for indigenous profession of civil engineers. The great works of former days attest that in all the essentials of natural constructive skill and boldness, united often with exquisite taste, the natives of India not behind any people of ancient or of modern times. But like all other arts, Architecture and Engineering cannot flourish except where there are the essentials of a good and settled government, and fair security for property, and some aspirations of religion or nationality to lift men's minds above the grovelling desires of more present material and temporary enjoyment.

I look upon this Institution, and more especially the spirit in which the benefactor of the College has undertaken the foundation, one among many happy auguries that this part of India will no longer romain dependent - foreign countries for instruction, and that we may look forward to the day when Western Iudia will have her own school of architecture and engineering. It will be difficult to overestimate the effect of this change - both the physical and moral feature of this part of India. On the physical interests of the country, because every day reminds us how much the future prosperity of Western India depends that development of our resources, which only be hoped for from the action of modern engineering science, have nowhere within many hundred miles of Bombay - Poons any great tracts of available culturable hand. Almost every and of fertile waste land in our older provinces is either inaccessible malarious. Our forests all too small to furnish timber and fuel our increasing population, and without engineering science, agriculture within a radius of 200 = 300 miles from this spot may be expected stand still. But will stand still? I believe not. We already in the of our railways what effect they have the agriculture of every district they touch; how they equalize prices; how they help m avert famine and scarcity; how they man are the populations with the produce of districts which had before market beyond their own borders. But railways only the backbons of complete system. Branch railways and common made roads into every corner of the country before we can say that we have made the most which be made of our present agricultural resources by means of improved communications. Let any contrast the present condition of this part of India m regards roads with that of even the less advanced portion of Continental Europe, and he will speedily become aware of how much remains for us to do before we are say that we have given to this country even a moderately perfect system of internal communication. Then again, - regards irrigation, it must strike any thoughtful resident in this place that, while the plains around are barren from drought, the vast beds of our rivers for several months in every year are filled with an abundant and certain supply of water which only requires to be distributed by the engineer's art over the surface of the surrounding plain to insure abundant harvest. How meffect this is no dream of an impractical theorist, but a subject of present and earnest consideration to some of our ablest engineers; whose labours will, I trust, ere long produce wisible and practical result. It would be tedious to dwell on other objects of engineering skill and science or on other certain effects upon agriculture and commerce. Harbours and works of reclamation, to which attention is now being directed, cannot but exercise most marked and beneficial influence on the material prosperity of this part of India. All these undertakings will require an enormous body of engineers of every grade; and where, it may be asked, are they to be found? Not surely, Sir, as you have well pointed out in a simple enlargement of the Public Works Department. That department already on a very gigantic scale, and must be further enlarged to enable it to meet the work which cannot be entrusted to other hands. But possible enlargement of any Government department can do for this country all that is required, and we have of late done best effectively to follow out policy which shall entrust to private enterprise and to local and municipal bodies as many as possible of those works which do not, from their nature, require the direct interposition of Government. We are doing best to extend a system of Local Funds,* which shall enable the people to do for themselves whatever can be usefully attempted with as little possible of Government interference; and we convinced that this system will the growth of a sound municipal feeling which will have the important results in the tension of what in this country include under the comprehensive term of "Public Works." The demand for architects and engineers which will be thus created, and the growing taste of which see many evidences around us for a greatly improved style of domestic architecture, will more than realize the anticipations to which you have referred in your extracts from the admirable remarks of Sir William Mansfield and Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier, relative to the probable results of the creation of a new profession open to our educated antive youth.

But I believe that this creation of mew profession of native educated engineers and architects will have a far greater effect than even the results which we see produced by our native Schools of Law and Medicine, and as much = the demand for architectural and engineering skill is likely to increase far more rapidly than the domand for educated lawyers and medical men, and I feel certain that the combined results will be far more important to the moral and intellectual feature of this part of India than even the most sanguine among us would anticipate. Some of these results will be direct-to learn what an architect or engineer must learn of the properties of materials and of the laws of nature, is in itself the most valuable intellectual learning, and there is equally valuable moral training in the direction of great works on which large bodies of men are employed. But there are indirect results which to ret more important in independent profession, which enables - educated young - to make his own way in the world without depending . Government employment. Many of a can recollect a time, not yet very remote, when there absolutely - career for a young native of education save the Government service, and that in a very limited and subordinate capacity. Things are much changed, and there a hundred channels of profitable employment open to our educated youth entirely independent of Government, and the charge has been, I feel assured, most beneficial one. It is sometimes argued with show of plausibility that there is policy in monopolizing for the Government service all the educated intelligence of the country. No one, Sir, has combated this notion more effectually than yourself. It is a notion which this Government has always abjured, and I am glad to be able to add my testimony, as the result of much recent enquiry and observation, that the educated youth of this part of India who independent of Government employment, are not a whit inferior to their fellows in the Government service in loyalty to our Sovereign and in . thorough and intelligent appreciation of the benefits of British rule. It seems to indeed that this is natural, and almost inevitable; for they who know most will best appreciate and respect the secret springs and sources of our power and the true motives of our policy, and this is the reason why I feel assured that, in assisting to open to his countrymen a new, liberal, and independent profession, Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier has not only done well for his own fame, and "conferred slasting benefit upon his own people," but that he has also added his contribution to the strength and stability of our empire in India.

Rookhminibai Charitable Dispensary, Gallian.

[Callian, January 1866.]

The Hon'ble Mr. Mangaldae Nathubboy said; --

Honourable Sir-This Dispensary, of which you have so kindly consented lay the commemoration-stone, came to be established in this way. It is the custom of the Hindus, m occasions of death and marriage, to spend large sums of money more or less usefully; and so, when it pleased God to take from by death, the life dearest to me,I wished to devote some money, usefully I could, upon such an occasion; and I wished also to un memorial of the life taken from me. It seemed to me that the useful thing I could do, and the very best memorial which I could set up. would be setablish and endow a dispensary; and no place seemed to to have better claims to such an institution than Callian. I accordingly offered Government the money necessary for the purpose; and they, in accepting it consented to appoint Doctors Giraud and Birdwood a Committee for the purpose of carrying out, in co-operation with their own Officers, my purpose. The Committee selected this site; they also appointed Mesars. Paris and Molecey architects, having approved of the design submitted by those gentlemen. The Building having been fairly begun, I have asked your Excellency thus publicly to lay the commemoration-stone in testimony the people for whose benefit the Dispensary is meant (and most of whom may still have their prejudices against such institutions | of the in which the Government holds them. In conclusion, I have to thank your Excellency for your gracious condescension in coming here this day, give stamp of your approval this undertaking. Your Excellency is ever thus earnest in everything which conduces to the welfare of the people of Iudia, and that not simply from principle of just government, but from sincere and personal sympathy with them. May I be permitted also to thank your Excellency for the great honour which you do me by your kind presence here this day, and to unite, in this acknowledgment, my thanks to the Ladies and Gentlemen who grace the ceremonial by their presence.

Mr. Mangaldas, -I feel very great pleasure in redeeming the promise to be present on this occasion, which I made to you some time ago, when you first communicated to me your intention of erceting this edifice, and I am really very sorry that Lady Frere's absence from Bombay prevents her being present to-day to witness the ceremony of laying the memorial stone of institution in which she has taken the very greatest interest. I have great pleasure in accoding to any wish of yours which you consider likely to be of benefit to the people of this place. I hardly think it would be necessary to take any great trouble to persuade the people for whose benefit this Dispensary is intended, that such institutions will be of the greatest use to them, or to them of the esteem in which all such institutions are held by Government. You that within the last few years there has been a very great change in the feelings of the people regarding the establishment of institutions of this kind; and in all the more advanced communities-and among these we may regard all places on the lines of railway-the people are fully alive to the blossings which such institutions as dispensaries and hospitals confer upon them. But there is me which made me more particularly degirous to accede to your wishes to be present: hecause I believe your present undertaking marks a great and important change in the general feeling of your community me the subject of a large class of your social observances, and in that point of view I wish to express the warm sympathy which L in with all countrymen who present, feel in the object you have in view. As you have very truly stated, it has long been the habit of your people, - occasions such as gave rise to this gathering, to devote large and of money to be expended in some particular There is nothing peculiar in this, because I believe in every part of the earth it . is more or less the habit of mankind to mark the great events of by the expenditure of such gifts as God has given them. It is remarkable that in every part of the world me people become more and more civilised. - they give greater permanence to expenditure of this kind; it may not be always a useful object, but it is generally something likely to endure long after oconnected with the event which it commemorates shall have passed away. But in these later the expenditure incurred by the Hindu community with a view commemorate any of the great events of their domestic life, hus invariably been of the most temporary description. It has been usual on such occasions to provide food for many people as the means of the family will allow. No doubt originally the persons selected those who from the supposed sanctity of their character or their poverty were considered worthy recipients of such bounty. But of late years, especially in our great and wealthy communities of the Presidency towns, this has been felt by all to be a very useless burden: and it also felt by all the more sensible members of the Hindu community that it added in a great degree to the poignancy of the grief which they endured at the loss of their friends, that on those occasions they were compelled to take part in expensive ceremonies which did no good to any one. This is a circumstance upon which we may all satisfy ourselves; for there is hardly be found throughout Bombay any conspicuous work erected by a Hindu during the last two or three generations, until we come to those buildings which have been comparatively recently erected. But, as you am aware, Mr. Mangaldas, this has not always been so. In Raippotana, where customs of this kind have been the longest in duration, it used to be the custom to mark the great events of demestic life by work of permanent good to the whole munity. And thus tanks, wells, and dharmashalas - erected commemorate them. It is still more remarkable that similar customs prevail amongst all the communities with which me sociated:—among the Parsees, as you know it has always been goodly custom to mark the great event of their domestic by some permanent good to their neighbours - to the community in which they live; and you me remember, I dare say, many instances in various parts of the country, I the manifestation of this spirit.

It is many years ago since I recollect staying in mold dharmashála at Jai Bordee, which had been erected to the memory of the wife of a charitable Parsi. So happened that time that I shared the shelter of the dharmashala with many homeless travellers; they had meet from Surat, a fire having burned down the greater part of that city. I recollect reading inscription which stated that this hospitable inn had been erected in memory of the founder's late wife; and I looked upon it, and at the motley crowd who shared its shelter with me, I felt that the man who erocted it had a larger sympathy with his race than me in the habit of giving credit for. We feel great interest in this undertaking. And we share your feelings in taking a part in the ceremony by which you hope to give permanence to the event are about to commemorate. I dare not here in public, allude further to this occasion; but I can assure you of this truth, that in every trial which relates to our common nature you will always find sympathy among us. I will not detain you further than to say that you have the sympathy of us all in this undertaking. I feel you will experience this soutiment among thousands of the more educated of your fellow-countrymen; and not among them only, but among the whole of the community. I shall now with great pleasure proceed to lay the foundation-stone.

[Bombay, 7th March 1866.]

Sir Alexander Grant, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Bombay, read the following address to His Excellency the Governor:—

Honourable Sir,—In the name of the University of Bombay, I beg your Excellency to by the chief was stone of the Buildings provided by the liberality of Mr. Cowa-ji Jehanghier Readymoney and of the Government of India for Elphinstone College, our principal uffiliated institution for education in arts. In many points these Buildings will have a connection with the history of the Bombay Presidency. In the first place, it is connected with the honoured was of Mountstuart Elphinstone. More than thirty-eight years ago, on the 22nd of August 1827, there was meeting of the Bombay Native Education Society to consider the most

* The Elphinstone College, designed by Mr. Trubshawe, is in the mediaval atyle. The ground floor contains a centre Hall, 30' × 30', two lecture rooms, 40' = 30', and two others 30' × 27'; on the first floor we two rooms 70' × 31', on centre room, 45% = 31', and an office room and Lavatory in the Tower. On the 2nd floor 40 Dormitories teak partitioned, for students. The corridors the ground and first flaor == 12 feet broad; the Dormitories open on terraces with mill iron ornamental railing in front. The Building is 55 feet in height to the caves, the Tower must the carriage porch is 150 feet high, being 105 feet in masonry and feat in high pitched routing. The College contains $46,907 cubic feet, and will probably cost Rs. 5.19, 977, or Rs. 80,000 less than the estimate made in 1865, which saving will be available for out-offices and m compound railing. The Building in faced with cut Coorla baselt in 6-inch courses, with horizontal bands of blue basalt interval : All covidor bases, columns, capitals and window dressings are of Porebunder stone; the arches of carridors, and over doors and windows, of alternate Porebunder and blue basalt; window parapers of Hemnaggar atone carved in geometrical tracery; a ceilings atuccoed; upper corridor floors Minten tiles. appropriate method of testifying the affectionate and respectful sentiments of the inhabitants of Bombay . the Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone his resignation of the Government of this Presidency. esult of the meeting public subscription of about £23,000, which afterwards accumulated to more than £40,000 towards the endownent of Professorshine for teaching the English language and the arts, sciences, and literature of Europe, to be denominated the "Elphinatone Professorships," This endowment is a lasting memorial of the public spirit of the people of Bombay. While in Madras and Calcutta, Presidency Colleges were established by the Government without popular assistance co-operation, in Bornbay the initiative was taken by the people themselves, and a fund provided by them in connection with a beloved name, for the introduction, of liberal and scientific education into this country. On the first establishment of the Elphinstone funds, Bombey and not ripe for the carrying out of their specific object, namely, the foundation of College. The existence of a College, properly so called, implies the existence of a subordinate organism of schools, in which scholars may be led from primary teaching up to high school instruction, and so prepared for a collegiate course. But in Bombay, in the year 1827, this organism did mot exist, and hence the gentlemen who first came out from England "Elphinstone Professors" found themselves unable to assume the professorial haracter. To the great benefit of the community they took up the part of igh school teachers, extending the range of their instructions whenever practiable. The so-called "Elphinstone Institution" which was established 10 college, but a collegiste school, and thus the Elphinstone funds were made applicable to a second and subsidiary object, namely, the foundation of a high school, while the primary object of the founders, namely, the establishment of a Professoriate, on College, was left in abeyance till the year 1836, when the collegiate element in the Elphinstone Institution - separated from the high school element, and Elphinstone College obtained a definite and distinct existence m the Presidency College of Bombay, while the Elphinstone Institution became the Presidency High School. The history, then, of the Building be this day inaugurated is closely related to the history of educational progress in the west of India. During the first years of its independent existence, Elphinstone College was located in a small hired house in the midst of the native bazaar. It was a new era for the College when in 1862 it removed Tankerville, a large and commodious house situated on Gowalia Tank. This house is the property of Mherbai, the venerable mother of Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier. It was placed at and disposal on very generous terms, Mr. Cowasji himself paying £120 a year towards the rent. The college students have already maffection for Tankerville.

sethuled and quiet situation is particularly favourable for study, and. . . in its gardens by waterside, young scholars may frequently be seen aitting with their books. It was in that house (owing to the facilities afforded, that the custom of students boarding within the college premises first successfully introduced in Bombay-a custom of which the advantares are manifold, and which is now widely spreading throughout the Providency. In 1863, my esteemed friend Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier manifusted his enlightened and paternal interest in the welfare of Elphinstone College, with which he had now become in a way connected, by offering of his own accord the sum of £20,000 towards the erection of suitable permanent buildings for the College, and in 1864, m account of the rise in the prices of building materials and labour, he added a second sum of £10,000 to his former munificent donation. A Committee, appointed by your Excellency's Government to make the necessary arrangements, requested Mr. James Trubshawe, Professor of Architecture, to furnish a design the Cowasii Jehanghier Buildings, and they supplied him with exact list of the college requirements, as known from practical experience. Mr. Trubshawe's design has most completely grown out of the necessities of the With the exception of the upper portion of the gate tower. I am not spring of any part of the elevations which does not spring immediately from the detailed internal plan which the Committee prescribed to their Architect. Stone verandahs considered necessary from cli matic considerations. On the ground floor there will be lecture rooms wit. dimensions calculated on former experience, also a central hall necessar for roll-calls and examinations. On the second floor there will be a librar and sitting rooms for Principal and Professors. On the third floor dormitories sufficient for fifty resident students. In deciding on the ground plan all unnecessary we costly features have been avoided. The Committee refrained from asking for courts or quadrangles; they asked for the simplest form of building, even in point of size confined themselves | the limits of what immediately necessary. The total estimate for Mr. Trubehawe's design at the recent of prices is about £55,000, which, after de sy has been sanctioned by the Government of India.* The

which have attended a carrying out of this Building have arichiefly from unparalleled spring of prosperity in the country. The history of the Cowasii Jehanghier Buildings will be connected with marrative of the strange commercial era in Bombay of 1862-65. also be connected with that which frequently follows in the train of national wealth, namely, a revival of the Fine Arts. It hoped that these Buildings will be no unworthy representative of the introduction of a purer into Applo-Indian Architecture. Most especially these Buildings will be connected with the history of your Excellency's administration-an administration that, above all others in India, has fostered the education of the neonle. The Cowasii Jehanghier Buildings have been designed, begun. and we trust that they may be finished, under your Excellency's rule. And it is a great satisfaction to all who are concerned to reflect that, in future ages, when the College founded by the people of Bombay in the age of a great Statesman, shall have borne in fruit to the diffusion of knowledge, men will read upon the corner stone of this edifice, provided by the hberality of a worthy citizen, your Excellency's distinguished name.

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere then replied:-

Sir Alexander Grant, Ladies, and Gentlemen-I need not tell you how much satisfaction it gives me to comply with your request to be present this day, and to lay the corner stone of this Building, It is not on an occasion like this that there is much of novelty in what be said, but there some features in the history of this day's proceedings which I should be sorry to let pass without a word of comment; and in particular let me bring to your recollection that the gentleman to whose liberality we owe this Building is not the first of his family who has thus distinguished himself. I find that a paternal ancestor of his was one of those to whom Bombay, and the Parsees of Bombay, are indebted for their share in the great China trade. Heerice, who is still well remembered among the older inhabitants of Bombay, ____ the first, in conjunction with the founder of the great house of Forbes and Company. that trade which has enriched many of his country-It he who, by the promptitude and punctuality of payments, obtained for his descendants the honourable and characteristic of Readymoney, and I lately found in some unpublished letters of the great Duke of Wellington-not in one letter but in three - four, addressed to the then Governor of

Madras, and the Governor General of Indis-records of his opinion of the firm, and expressions of his belief that that firm had made their mercantile undertakings subservient to the good of the British Government in Western India. I am told too that, - his maternal side, the gentleman to whose liberality we owe this Building, is descended from one who is still remembered as a leader of the Parsees in his day, and of whom it is told that the Governor of those days, Mr. Jonathan Duncan, ordered the great bell of St. Thomas's Church to be tolled, as a testimony of the public respect to his memory, me his funeral passed by. These things, are not insignificant in a community like that of the Parsecs. And while think of the ancestors and of the descendant, do not let us forget the lady to whose liberality the college has for so many years owed its habitation. Fortunately, in this community this lady is not alone as one who shows herself worthy to be a wife and a mother among the liberal Parsecs of Bombay. Let us trust that she may long be spared to me her example followed by the matrons of the Parsi community; and let us trust, too, that in time to come the fashions of the community may so far change, that it may be permitted to the ladies among the Parsecs to be present when their fellow-citizens pay a tribute of honour and respect to sons, and husbands, and brothers, of whom they may so well be proud. There is one part of your programme to-day which I am sorry must remain unfulfilled; and I regret that Mr. Trubshawe's absence to-day should be occasioned by the failure of his health—a failure I fear attributable to his residence in this country. It is a matter of regret to him, I am sure, and to every body connected with Bombay, that he men not allowed to carry to completion any of the great works which he designed; but let us not forget that, though the principles of Architecture sufficiently well established, and to me extent popularised, before marrived among us, yet it was not till your predecessor (Mr. Edward Irvine Howard,) as Director of Public Instruction introduced Mr. Trubshawe to take his place as Professor of Architecture in Bombsy that we ____ able to see a practical end put | the abominations of plaster and of stucco in our public buildings, and from his arrival I trust we may date the practical commencement of a better and purer style of architecture. I feel assured, Sir, that you will join with in expressing your thanks to Colonel Fuller for the generous way in which he undertaken the execution of Mr. Trubshawe's work. Here I trust last this College may find a fitting and a permanent home, and one worthy of the great which it will bear. And surely, Sir, there is no name in India that is worthy of permanent and respectful regard than that of Mr. Mountstnart Eighinstone. had left the country many years before I arrived in it, and the only occasion on which I had the privilege and the honour of being in communication with him was me in which he took especial interest-the extension to the worthy inhabitants of India of the right to hereditary honours, which in England in much value. It then often used to occur to me to ask myself, why it was that Mr. Elphinstone's name stood so pre-eminent among Indian states-We all know how able, how courageous, how learned, how sympathising he was; but in these, as in other qualities of . Goand Administrator, there have happily been many men who were in no respect his inferiors. But I believe that there has been who thoroughly represented the mind and the policy of England towards the inhabitants of this country the late Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone. We all recollect the story which is told of him, and told I know with perfect truth, of the which he gave to me of his assistants on the subject of education, when he reminded him that, whatever the consequences, if men duty to this country men clear, there was but men course for us, and that was to follow out that duty. It was not only in matters of education, but in every other respect, that this man the guiding principle of his mind; and was, I happy to think, guiding principle of the thoughtful mind of England regarding India, of the statesmen, of the writers, and of the philosophical thinkers of our mation. You know that a very different school has many advocates among ourselves; it has advocates inhabitants of this country, -- a school of stronger more absolute government. They refer to other European nations, which, themselves, and in distant colonies, have exerrised wery different form of government; and they tell with portions of India no way superior to our own, which not only contribute a very large was annually as a tribute to the governing country in Europe, but bear every outward mark of prosperity and advance in civilization. This is not the place, Sir, to discuss the merits of such a form of government as might find in Java or elsewhere, and contrast it with our own. It is enough to know that those me not the principles of the English Government. The English Government has in this country looked governing India for the benefit of the people of India, and he far me possible through the agency of the people of India; and the sim of England has ever been to raise the inhabitants of India, - that they may be prepared to take a part with selves in the honourable work of governing this country. I may not be that me have always been very successful in this attempt. In establishing different institutions we have had varied success; some have been most successful, such as Legislative Councils and Municipalities; and in other institutions and sepecially those connected with education—there has been seach to encourage those who agreed with Mr. Elphinstone in this respect. It is enough for m to know that this is the deliberate purpose of England, and that the muse unselfish principles which England, has always acted upon in Canada, in Australia, and in Africa, are those which England intends to pursue in this country. I need not tell you, Sir, how great a gratification it is to find my associated, in however ministerial a degree, with such a man in that of Mr. Elphinetone, and with such purposes as that which you have this day in hand, and I will detain you no longer than to express the satisfaction with which I accede to your request.

The Inblic Works' Congress.

CLOSING ADDRESS III THE

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere said: --

Gentlemen: -There good many questions remaining, of which I should like very much to discuss at this Conference, but a number of you me anxious to get away to your regular work, and I should be sorry to delay you longer. Those questions therefore which remain we shall discuss with the Superintending Engineers and Revenue Commissioners, who stay behind in Poona. Some of these questions are of great importance, such as the general question of the subordinate members of the Public Works Department, how they were to be trained, and how they to be got. There is also the general question of admitting military officers or young men who do not belong to the profession of Engineers to the department. These are matters which will the efficiency of every one in your establishments and we will do the best m can, with the advice of the Superintending Engineers and Revenue Commissioners to arrive at a satisfactory determination in reference thereto. If any of you have any particular advice to give me the subject, we shall be very glad if you will stay a few days m discuss them, or if you will leave a statement of your views with the Superintending Engineers or with the Revenue Commissioners, the case may be, they will be carefully considered. The question of training subordinates is me particularly in which we should have been very glad to hear what officers up at Ahmedabad and officers down at Belgaum had to suggest. Howshall do our best with the means we have by us to arrive some satisfactory solution of the question. There is one very large question which relates more less to all the military works at Poons—the question of the Fort of Kirkee which is to the ordnance factories. It was, however, scarcely in a position to discussed and I am afraid main not be in a position to do much for the next month = so. For see reason. = will not detain body of officers any longer in Poons. I have to thank you all individually and collectively for the aid you have given us, and I only hope—though I shall not be here to muit—that these ings will be continued in future years. Some of - apt think - lose a great deal of time in sitting here, and that - are not actively and usefully employed when are sitting all day we desk ; but I do not take this view of these meetings myself, for every one of m is the better to get among his fellows and among his superiors and inferiors in professional knowledge. There is one point of special importance, and that is the degree which these meetings tend to clear up misunderstandings between officers who me for a great part of the year in the jungles, those officers who superintend them, and the Government who is charged with the whole department. I suppose there is no man taking much interest in his work who does not get into a state of chronic dissatisfaction at times with every-body above him and he prone to think that others who are not working so hard as he is get the larger measure of Government support, and the money which he takes a pride in expending well. I know that officers who take a hearty interest in their work have a tendency to take that rust which makes them think they am not appreciated, and that they me not working me freely in the department me other men. I know nothing which as surely takes off that feeling as that which makes a mix with others; and when he begins to find that nobody in particular is to blame, he then goes away with the impression that if he has been working hard, he has been upon the whole no better than others. The whole body of duties in which we me engaged is one which has enormously increased of late years and which is increasing daily. I we looking we return which Colonel Kendall gave me shewing the progress of the Engineering department in this Presidency from the time I came to the country thirty-five years ago. Then there were in the Presidency five = six officers employed, and none of them very vigorously on the sort of works on which the Public Works Departis now busy. As you know, the officers who are memploying their whole time in the Department would be several sheets of printing, and yet I may quite certain mare only at the beginning of things, I feel assured that Colonel Playfair's Department of Irrigation is destined to develop itself, just me the Railways have developed themselves, and become an entirely separate branch and almost a separate department in itself. Every year I think will see may increase in the work which the Engineers—Military and Civil—have to do. I can only hope it will be always done in the same spirit me it has been done by the officers whom I had the pleasure of meeting in former years and the present, and in men this should be men last meeting I bid you Farewell.

CEREMONY OF LAYING WWW FOUNDATION-STONE.

Mr. A. D. Robertson C. S., Commissioner of Customs and Chairman of the Harbour and Pilotage Board, gave an account of Building, after which His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere said:—

Mr. Robertson, and Gentlemen.—I think that any me who listened to the address which me have just heard read, and he considers the composition of meeting, will feel satisfied that the purpose for which seemabled here to-day, in this old pirate stronghold, is comething more than enjoying the hospitality of the Harbour Board and the voyage down beautiful Harbour to which they invited of this at least I feel well assured, that there is no one here present who was in Western India, the time so many disastrous wrecks occurred last who not join with the Board in their determination to spare no exertion which could help to svert such disasters in future; and every one of us will, I am confident, rejoice with the members of the Board I finding that so much progress has been already made towards the completion of this most necessary work. I am glad that the Board invited us all is be present here this day. because I know of mother method by which public attention could be so effectually directed to the very important work which the Harbour Board has in hand. We all feel greatly obliged to the Chairman for the account which he has read to us, of what the Board has been doing, and I am glad of this opportunity of tendering to the Harbour Board on behalf of myself and my colleagues in the Government who we unable to be present this day, an expression of our sense of the very great success which has attended the experiment of constituting this Board. You will recollect that until a few years ago all public duties connected with the management of the Harbour and its Pilotage were divided among several departments and offices. The Government Secretariat, in both the Public Works and Marine Departments, the office of the Superintendent of Marine and Dock Master, the Master Attendant and the Commissioner of Customs, and the Chief Magatrate,-sli had something to say to Harbour matters; and it extremely difficult for any one who had business connected with the Harbour to tell where he ought to go, - to whom he should apply, the consequence being that Harbour matters went, as sailors say "drifting." What went the business of a many people, became the business of nobody in particular, and it mainly owing to this uncertainty as to who man responsible, that the defects in the lighting of this Harbour remained so long uncorrected. The Chairman, in his address, has done simple justice to a meritorious s event of the State who is no longer among us, when he brought to our recollection the untiring energy with which Captain Barker of the late Indian Navy, year after year urged this subject upon our attention. caused delay. Everybody wished to see something done, but nobody knew who was to begin to do it, Captain Barker's perseverance brought the question to a proper focus. If benighted enariners have in future to rejoice in the completed work of the Harbour Board, I hope they will not forget to invoke m blessing on the memory of their old fellow-seaman of the Indian Navy. I do not know where see could find a better illustration than this subject affords, of how rapidly the advance of improvement in this country renders obsolete best arrangements for administration. I see many gentlemen here present besides Captain Young and the Rev. Mr. Fletcher who well able am to remember the day, when was present Colaba Light-house was the only first class light-house in British India. It was not, I believe, until 1844 that the present beautiful light-house at Madras was finished, and that was, if I am not mistaken, the first great lighthouse erected in the Bay of Bengal. Since then light houses have multiplied, but they are still far from being all that want. In those days the Colaba light divided with the Mint, the Dockyard, and the Town the honour of being one of the great lights of Bombay, and we used to send straitgers from up-country to Bombay with introductions to Captain Young's predecessors to obtain them admission to inspect what then considered one of the marvels of Western India. But the rapid advance of Bombay has sadly obscured the glories of the Colaba light. Spires and factory chimneys have grown up about it, and confuse the mariner who approaches by day in the driving send of the S. W. Monsoon, while long and of himpe in perspective, and the bright Argand lamps me hospitable boards in Colaba and on Malabar Hill combine to puzzle him by night, and he requires something taller, distinct, brighter, and more seaward, than his old friend, the Colabs light-house. I trust me shall have such a light-house me he requires as far me possible out on the Prongs as make have settled the many difficult engineering and other problems nected with a work of such magnitude and permanent importance. I am glad to think that the Board in their have rather under-estimated the progress which the question has made, | I feel confident when once we have clearly ascertained what is to be done, neither Government nor the Harbour Board will allomany delay to meet in placing upon the dreaded Prongs of Colaba the best possible light in the best possible position which modern science and scientific appliances auggest and supply. It is not only here in Bombay, but on every part of the coast of India, that this matter of Harbour lighting has suddenly assumed an importance which it previously did not possess. Up to a very recent period there - comparatively little necessity for lighting up the creeks and harbours anywhere except at Bombay and the other great ports which trequented by square-rigged shipping. There has for ages been a small light on the tomb of old Governor Vaux at the mouth of the Taptee. A small light-house on the island of Perim in the Gulf of Cambay the work of John Malcolm's Government, and placed by the late of Kutch bastion Mandavie; a circlet of ____ oil lights, each of them not much brighter than an ordinary bedroom light, considered sufficient for many a port which carried we busy trade with distant lands. The native craft, myou know, men ventured to sea, except in the fair season,-they appeared to know their way almost instinctively by night and day, and when in doubt, could and did always anchor. all this is now changed—much of the coasting trade passing into the hands of our coasting steamers; and it absolutely necessary for their convenience, that the exact entrance of the ports they have to visit, and the proper bearings of the anchorage should be made known by a good and permanent light. Much has been already done ... our ports, by the Chairman's predecessors in the office of Commissioner of Customs, but very much is required; and I was glad to find that in this, as in every other kind of improvement, the Native States - the Kattiawar Coast, under Major Keatinge's management setting a good example to their neighbours. The som of Porebandar and Nawab of Joonaghar at Veravul both we up lights w those ports, which they will, I hope, maintain and improve. I trust the gentlemen here present, connected with the Indian coasting trade, will not let this subject drop, in there is not a in cosst where there is not for improvement, and hardly where the trade if properly developed would pay for it. I after all the care of lighting the harbour one of the many important duties which devolve on the Board, and when reckon them up find less for apprehending that the Board will not fulfil its duties, than for fearing may be overwhelmed by their multiplicity and importance. They have already dealt with the subject of Pilotage, and I hope they will be able to bring to a satisfactory practical issue the troversy which in this in in many other branches of administration is always going on between mixed establishment and a system of volunteers, and to strike the balance between the trained experience of a permanent service, and the energy which is imparted by open competition. The Board have also already taken up the most important question of the improvement of malanding and wharfage accommodation, and this alone is undertaking which for years to come will task all their energies and resources before our present lamentable deficiencies are fully supplied. Connected with this question is the subject of Wet Docks; and the port much indebted to Mr. Russel Aithen for bringing forward scheme which will ensure a thorough discussion of the very important question whether Wet Docks are, or are not, suitable and desirable as additional facilities for the landing and shipment of cargo at this port. This is a question the importance of which must attract the attention of the Harbour Board well as the Municipality as affecting in a very direct manner the great interests man mitted to their charge; but I am sure both these bodies will exme for suggesting that beyond watching the discussion with interest, they should not for the present interfere, but leave question be decided in its commercial merits by the shipping and mercantile interests of the port. For this question of floating docks is essentially a commercial question. Whether it is, or not, the better and seconomical plan to load and unload ships

dock-or at present to anchor them in the Harbour and load and unload them by large boats lighters, is a matter which but the merchants, the shipping owners and ship masters, whose interests involved, accurately decide. If it would pay to have wet docks, then I feel assured that after the subject has been fully discussed = shall have thom. They will be provided by the enterprise of those who will find in their construction a profitable investment of capital. But, if they will not pay such an investment, then, I think, was should be taken that the Municipal of the Island or the income of our port funds not diverted from their legitimate objects to the construction of expensive works, which are not commercially needed and which will not pay commercially. The question to me of the comparative value of the time and labour involved in the two modes of shipping and landing cargo. It is a question on which . present informed I do not feel competent to offer any opinion. But I trust that if floating or wet docks are found to be desirable and useful in a commercial point of view they will be undertaken on a scale and in a spirit like that of our great docking companies in England, which me not only commercially profitable, but are so managed as to afford facilities for commerce at reasonable and not monopoly rates of charge. I am confident that after due discussion and ventilation the merchants and shipowners of Bombay will arrive at the right result, and that they will not leave it to the Harbour Board to undertake, on occount of Harbour funds, which am only be properly done in the way it is done in England. -namely, m a matter of private enterprise, in which the undertakers seek for a reasonable return : and I feel certain that while these things are directed by the merchants of Bombay, their prowill be actuated by the same sort of spirit which docking companies of England and which makes them responsibilities of a public trust and keeps them from looking exclusively to the advantage of their own Company. is another point of importance which, though directly in the hands of the Harbour Board. trust they will never loss night nor cease to will never loss night nor cease to attention. I may mention that it we the action of the commercial community in this matter which first enabled my predecessor George Clerk to make a practical beginning of this important and long-neglected work, and I am certain that every here present will be glad to know that the subject has of late occupied the anxious attention of H. M.'s Government, both in India and in England. Some delay has been occasioned by the fluctuating results of the great contest between wood, iron, and stone, which hardly yet be said to be decided in Europe. But I am glad to be able to wou that great progress has been made in determining the character and precise nature of the best defences, floating well as fixed, which can be provided for this port, and I am confident that when once this important question is settled, no considerations of expenditure will deter H. M.'s Government from providing the most effectual defences possible for our noble Harbour. And this reminds me that a very large portion of the harbour, and in mean respects the most commodious and most easily defensible, has until lately been comparatively neglected. But the attention of our enterprising merchants and engineers has now I believe been effectually directed to the subject, and I confidently look forward to the day mu not far distant when the sheltered deep waters in the north eastern portion of the harbour about Butcher's Laland, Hog Island, and Elephants will present a scone of commerce as active mum now witness on the western side of the harbour. There is, however, we very important question which, I trust, will receive early and special attention from the Harbour Board, and that is the effect which has been and is being produced by the closing of the Chemboor and Sion Causeways. That effect may be altogether desirable, or the reverse. It may m may not be capable of correction, but there can be me doubt that it is very great and important, and that it cannot be too soon looked to, and I would strongly advise the Board to see that me early opinion is obtained from the highest authorities - such matters in England, and that the opinion is grounded, not me casual and partial information, but me the most complete statement of facts, past and present, which modern science can suggest. This is emphatically one of the suljects which the Harbour Board will, I hope, consider as specially committed to their charge. I trust that it may in.

my power before I leave India to something towards placing constitution of the Board wider and more permanent footing. I am sure that every who considers the variety importance of their functions will with me it not fitting such a body should have any but the most permanent and independent constitution can give it; and hope to be able to give by legislative enactment to the wish expressed by the Board the close of the Chairman's address. I will now, Sir, beg the Rev. Mr. Fletcher to ask the blessing of Almighty God this great work of utility and humanity, and then proceed comply with your request by laying the corner-stone.

The toasts of "The Queen and all the members of the Royal Family", having been drunk with enthusiasm, Mr. A. D. Robertson, C. S. (the Chairman,) then proposed the Health of His Excellency the Governor.

His Excellency, in replying to the toast, said; Gentlemen:—It was not without some little difficulty that I attended here this day, but I safely say that in my progress to this table I have with a difficulty so great as that of adequately expressing to you what I feel for the kindness with which you have just drunk my health. In the very partial estimate of what I have been able to do, which has been made by my friend the Chairman, there is only man point an which I must express my dissent. If there has been any failure of man in what I have attempted to do, I have no one's shoulders but my man an which to place that failure. I can

I would beg you to drink manner to one of the latest institutions in this Presidency—to drink prosperity to the Harbour and manner to its every work,

John Firth, Honorary Secretary to the David Sassoon Memorial Fund, read account of the proposed Building, after which Mr. A. D. Sassoon C. S. I., addressed His Excellency the Governor in follows:—

Your Excellency,—In requesting your Excellency to lay the of this Building, the circumstances under which I have the honour of this Building, the circumstances under which I have the honour of the are such to awaken very peculiar feelings in my mind. I forget that I stand here in the room of my father, — more, with whom originated upwards of three years ago the proposal to erect a suitable building for the Mechanics' Institution which the generous — enlightened of the late Mr. James J. Berkleyt founded in Bombay, and the hearty co-operation of — brother, Mr. George Berkley, and many other gentlemen have greatly enlarged. Nor can I forget that the ceremony which I — commissioned — request your Excellency — perform is invested with great and uncommon interest, as being not only — of the latest public — in which your Excellency will take part before closing your long and illustrious in India, but also the ceremony of laying the very first — of Institution was designed by Mesers. Scott, McClelland, and Co. Imground floor, which is 64'×30', is intended for a Museum, if the Bending-room and Library are above, reached by a staircase, on landing of the librarian's Office. There is an arouse in front, the source portion of which being raised one floor higher than the rest of the building, forms a Tower. It was proposed to construct a specious Lecture Hall at back, this portion of the scheme is been for want funds. Exterior walls use faced with Coosls irregular mently pointed. Upper Reading Room has an open roof; the rest of the ceilings planter.

Expenditure has been Re, 1,00,533, out of an estimate is 1,45,279, in 60,000 magives by late Mr. Sessoes, and Ra. 20,000 by the Fund.

new Town which by your Excellency's energy is to be erected in the Esplanade. which is to perpetuate your Excellency's India. I must gratifying your Excellency and of the very wou have kindly consented to perform is a lay the foundaof an institution which will help for many centuries to extend the great cause of education in this country which you have so much at heart, and mhich you have laboured so carnestly and m successfully to promote, among the people over whom you rule. Your administration, Sir. of the affairs of Western India will be remembered for two things—the zeal with -/hich you have ever striven - push forward every work that would develop the material wealth of this country, and the same would with which you have striven to awaken a desire for knowledge and learning and high-mindedness, withe true conditions of national glory. We see our harbours filling with ships of every clime: ____ manufactories arising around us introducing new industries and overtarning improving old | see Railways spreading and net-work country, carrying the was if peace and civilisation into regions of the densest barbarian, among tribes who have not forgotten that they born to bounderers and robbers. I whatever of art in the applied sciences, India, under liberal and paternal rule of borrows from the West, and must also borrow led clear and intelligent heads, the strong arms, and the practised hands of workmen to carry out the work and instruct ruder people | just = have to borrow had her, warriors, statesmen, economists people in their long and new apprenticeship to Empire. It is for me India already owes - much, to whom with every year of peace will infinitely more, without whom people will reach maintain supremacy among the nationa that the Building which your Excellency about a commence is, in the first instance m its name implies. mainly intended; or rather, I should say, I is designed for all large and increasing class of young and intelligent Englishmen, who bring their experience and cultivated brain Bombey, whether to on the guidance or practice of mechanical labour or into and of the subordinate departments of commercial ____ It is designed also for that large ____ of natives whose opportunities of instruction your Excellency done so much to extend, and who, although not following im practice of mechanical arts, may yet employ their leisure in the study of useful branches knowledge these walls. And the day, Sir, is distant, but I hope, may I rel certain, I is coming, when native artisans, were knowledge, will crewd the lecture halls and class rooms of this Institution | study the great laws of mechanical philosophy, will generally to fit themselves for being better workmen and better citizens. Will is a proud day in England, and will perhaps repay her for the lives of . precions sum she has sacrificed for India, when she sees, under her benign rule, not merely creation, from an acute but unskilled people, of a race of mechanics skilled in the methods of the West, but when she sees the mechanics I country crowding in the thirsty parauit of knowledge upon the footsteps of her own more intelligent and highly favoured working men. I think, Sir. that day lies in the future, and I therefore acknowledge | pride | prompt and generous support which your Excellency's Government Government of India gave to my late father's proposal to contribute Rs. 50,000 towards the erection of Mechanics' Institute on condition of Government granting equal value. The amount so contributed has been increased by the balance of the sum subscribed by the public of Bombay was a morial to my late father, and I cannot conceal the gratification it affords to think that while his name is to be identified with this Institute to be eracted within its walls, the greater portion of the Memorial Fund will be applied to the extension and beautifying of the Building and to the perfecting of the means of education which it will provide. I am ing, he would have felt as I now feel, and as all the members of Committee feel, that there was me hand more worthy to lay the foundation-stone than that of Sir Bartle Press. A career spent in noble well-doing like your Excellency's, in the promotion of every great and good work which will make the people of this country happier and better, and not the least in the anxious promotion of Universities and Schools, cannot be more fitly and nobly closed in India than by laying in foundation and of a building which shall afford the means of instruction to the poorer classes of your own countrymen who come to these shores, and to every one, European or Native, who desires to employ his leisure in refined amusement, m in the man study of literature and science. The act which your Excellency to-day, which as I have said is almost the very hast public act that your Excellency will perform in a country you have served a long, in faithfully, and so well, is one that will bear its fruits for many centuries. It is that may remind you that as this stone is but one in a building will confer blessings on thousands, your whole life has been, at were, stone in the edifice of Indian civilization, conferring inestimable blessings on millions, a stone on which future builders may build without fear I ruin change. It is my pleasing task, therefore, as representing my and on behalf of the Committee, was your Excellency before leaving shores to lay the foundation stone of this Mechanics' Institution, and may the Almighty long spare your Excellency to hear of its fruits.

III Excellency ... H. B. I Frere replied :--

Mr. Sassoon,-The address which you have just read leaves very little for me to say beyond expressing my cordial in the noble sentiments it expresses and my propert truths which you there state. When this Building was first spoken of I min hopes that your venerated father might have been present here me the work actually begun, and that he would have been spared to me it well carried on towards its completion; but it is. atill and satisfaction under the circumstances to know that he followed by those who so worthily represent him, and that the grateful remembrance of the people of Bombay will perpetuate in this Building the revered memory of him whom all admired and beloved. Under ordinary circumstances, Sir, I might have felt some scruple in beginning another work while there was so many on which we have bestowed time and labour still incomplete in this city; but I felt that those who me interested in carrying out this undertaking would not allow any obstacle to interfere with completion,-that, on the contrary, they would steadily, and in way belitting good mechanics, carry to a completion work which wisely designed and well begun. And here, Sir, let add my tribute to what you have said regarding the class for whose especial benefit this Building was designed. I should have been sorry to have left India with nothing but lip testimony as to the respect which I feel for that class and the national pride which I feel in belonging to the mans nation which sends many of them forth. You have well said, Sir, that India requires the mechanics of England well m her warriors and her statesmen, her economists and her administrators; and I believe it because I find in the mechanics of England so many of the high qualities which - find in her warriors and statesmen that this is strictly and literally true. The courage and the devotion | duty, the sense | that belongs to pleasure is subordinate to duty, can be shown as well by the engineer in the plate of mengine or by mechanic man anvil by the soldier breach by the closet. And, Sir, me my testimony, and the testimony of the Government to which I belong and which I serve, to what you have we with regard Berkley. has left a monument of which the greatest conquerors and the greatest of in former days might have been proud; and he has left menduring recollection of in the minds of all who knew him personally, who knew steady devotion - duty, and who - that - considerations of and wealth and life could not induce him to depart from duty. And I trust that his memory will long remain, not only perpetuated in the great works which he achieved, but embalmed in the recollections of those who know what an excellent example he to the mechanics of every age and clime. I am glad too, Sir, mopportunity is afforded me before I leave this country of seeing and of those buildings commenced which are have designed in the place of the old Ramparts of Bombay. Unluckily, Sir. you are not the first in this work, because our friend Mr. A. T. Crawford has stolen a march upon us by planting his standard mu the Esplanade in the edifice (i. e. the new Municipal Markets,)* which prung up = rapidly, which we lately = beautiful, which contains many examples of what is most peculiar in good mechanical engineering. But still, Sir, I hope that the edifice which will stand where we now stand will be the first, strictly speaking, of the buildings which replace the old Ramparts of Bombay. I do not say, Sir, that it will be the first of a new town to be built upon the Esplanade, for I trust that were will be taken that no men town should grow up here. I do not say this from any doubt of the people of Bombay m because I think there can be any question that were or later the whole of that magnificent design of Mr. Tr .bshawe will be carried out in its entirety. I believe, Sir, it is not only a very beautiful design in itself, but is a strictly practicable design; and I look forward to the timethough may be in my lifetime—when all those great public buildings which it is proposed to raise here, and that fringe private buildings which designed for each side of the wide boulevard, which to replace the Ramparts of Bombay, will literally carried out. I feel assured that the public offices and courts of justice and the hospitals will all, one after the other, be built. But, Sir, I trust that care will be taken that nothing is done this Esplanade than to complete that which Nature and our ancestors have already provided for ... I trust, Sir, that the buildings which will grow up here will be me ornament to the Esplanade, but that the Esplanade itself will be preserved, embellished with gardens and adorned with beautiful buildings, and having good reads, and good places for walking and riding in, where the gentlemen and ladies of Bombay-and above all, the mechanics of Bombay-will take their healthful recreation and exercise;-that the Esplanade will continue to be the Esplanade, though adorned with fine buildings and beautiful gardens and fountains, and that it will remain as it now is, one of the great amenities of this city. And now, Sir, I will with great pleasure do your bidding in laying this the first stone of the Memorial Hall, and I trust that it will stand long memorial of all the virtues of him who founded it and whose _____ it bears, and of the high qualities which distinguish those for whose use it is intended.

Tord Mapier of Magdala, G. C. B., G. C. s. 1.0

A Banquet was given by the Members of the East India United Service Club Lord Napier of Magdala, G. C. B., G. C. S. I.

-000----

Sir H. B. E. Frere presided on the occasion.

After the usual loyal totate had been drunk, the Chairman called for bumpers for the toast of the evening, and said:—

Gentlemen,—I have no intention to carry you through the history of the operations in Abyssinia, which you will find much better narrated in the Despatches of our guest, nor will I venture to give expression to the opinions which I know you will entertain concerning those operations. It is proverbially useless labour to gild refined gold, and it is something than useless, after the national stamp has been fixed, if were, the gold of the Royal Mint, to attempt to impress any private particular mark of www. But there is another reason why I should not attempt to may anything regarding Sir Robert Napier's was a soldier in this company, because I was around who for the last forty forty-five years have served with him in every part of the globe in which he has been employed. I see men who have fought and bled with in the field, who have delved with him in the trenches, who have fought with him through the whole of the Panjaub campaign. There many who served with him throughout those troubled months in Oude, and who with him when he tracked the rebels through the almost pathless jungles of Central India. There are others who served with him in China, and in the presence of these men, to whom we ill do honour, I will say nothing of Sir Robert Napier's career was soldier. But there was point respecting which me civilian and a me of peace I may be allowed in passing to say a few words, and that is the effect which Robert Napier's skill and science have had upon the in which he has been engaged. It is at this moment a question of great interest to philanthropists and philosophers all over the world to know whether, as we become exientific and more skilled in warfare we become more humane or ____ brutalised; and it is therefore of importance to consider the spirit in which the skilful and scientific soldier who is our guest this evening has entered upon the campaigns in which he has been engaged. I would beg those who were his fellow-workers at Lucknow to recollect how, with the eve of soldier and the skill of an engineer, he showed the veterans with whom he was associated how they might turn the flank and get in the man of the enemy, and gain a victory must ten times their force with the least possible expenditure of human life and human suffering. Again in the celebrated expedition to China, the account of which yet remains to be written a military ploit, have yet blearn how, when the oldest warriors in the force stood appalled the immense strength of the Chinese position, and looked for a vast expenditure of life m likely to occur, Bobert Napier, by his skill and science, discovered the weak points of the Chinese position, and the strong forts which they held III iu single day. What he did to alleviate III horrors of war in Abyssinia you know. They matters of recent mory to us all. But let me remind you that these deeds of Sir Napier as a soldier have been but episodes in a long life of labour. For five or ten years he has been called upon to draw his sword in the foremost ranks, and I was any man here present whether was thinks that the years of civil labour which Sir Robert went through in any way incapacitated him for military service. It is as a soldier, it is not rest engineer and constructor alone, that I would my you to mad of a Robert Napier, Long after he distinguished himself - soldier he called upon by the foremost men in Iudia, by Lord Dalhousie, by Mr. Thomsson, and by his old comrade, Sir Henry Lawrence—to aid them in planning a scheme of civil works in the Panjaub; and the roads, the canals, and bridges which he then constructed will remain long after the fame of many of our victories will have become mere ters of historical record. It is not, however, to Napier = soldier and an engineer that I ask you were to drink, -it is to Napier the comrado of those who am sitting here. You have known him intimately as only Anglo-Indians know each other; you have known him me the man who for forty years never forsook me friend, or was known to do a discourteous action; as a men who, in this age of Mammon-worship, kept himself free from temptations, and lived a pure and noble life, only to be paralleled in the poems of men who wrote about the true-hearted and loval knights of old :- yet man who was no idle dreamer, but ateady, stern, persistent worker in all that he took in hand. I call on you gentlemen, to drink " Long life to your fellow-soldier and fellow-worker, Robert Napier, and long enjoyment to him of the honour for which his Sovereign and the unanimous voice of the country have designated him.

The Chairman (Sir H. B. Frere) then proposed the next toast, "The Lords Commons," and said that the Abyssinian Expedition had been watched with interest by theorists to see how a Parliamentary form of Government would manage a a dislike that just concluded. Only a year ago, there plenty of people, Englishmen as well as foreigners who believed great war achievement addisance was achievement any thing wrong we been told that institutions were the bottom of it, that personal government despotic institutions measurery vigour in the field, and, in short, they managed these things better-somewhere else. Well. seen parties, a time when party spirit bitter, throw saids all hostility, and, when assured that the was a just and proper one, unite mone man to enable their Sovereign to sustain the honour of their country. He did not believe that in any country, ancient modern, in any form of government, howconcentrated, greater unanimity could have been displayed than a shewn by the two Houses of Parliament in voting the supplies and in doing all that was necessary in sending out this expedition. Parliament said in effect, "We have a just quarrel, there is no other consistent with the national honour but make : have a good Minister to direct that War and a good General to conduct it; " and then they voted with alacrity the for carrying the War. The result had been not only that the war are carried to a successful conclusion, but that thoughtful men all the world, would now think twice before committing themselves to the conclusion that despotism cessary for the effectual vindication of national honour when the last resource left open for that purpose. The Chairman concluded by coupling with the toast the name of the Right Honourable William Ewart Gladstone, M. P.

The Chairman (Sir H. B. E. Frere) then called upon those present drink the health of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India, the Hight Honourable Sir Stafford Northcote Bart, P.,—and said when they were assembled to do honour to the great General who had conducted the expedition to successful close they would perform their duty very imperfectly, if they forgot Minister upon whom devolved the greatest part of the labour of directing operations in this country. It was no disparagement any other department say that greater part of the labour, and almost the whole responsibility rested upon the shoulders of the Secretary of India. It would have been no small schievement have planned such an enterprise, have decided on the when, how means of doing efficiently what we country required him to do; but this truth a very small part of work which devolved upon-Secretary of State. When the operations were commenced, the difficulty and only begun, and nobody who did not know what those labours could conceive the trouble and responsibility attending wery-day labours of the Secretary of State during the whole time that the operations were in progress. It was not that every day brought forth some new suggestion and improvement which had to be adopted but that every day also brought forth suggestions which will be resisted, changes of plan which had we be stoutly negatived, and interference muthe part of those who had neither authority responsibility, and who had to be put down. The country owed a deep debt of gratitude to the Right Honourable Stafford Northcote for labours which had extended over many months and had involved deep anxiety; and the Indian Services ought to grateful to him for the manner in which he had sought to know the members, personally and collectively, and had constituted himself their discriminating yet active defender.

The Houourable Jagannath Sankarsett.

A public meeting of the Inhabitants of Bombay held in the Town Hall to vote a Statue* to the Hon'ble Jagannath Sankarsett. Sir Jameetji Jejeebhoy, who presided on the occasion, read the following letter from His Excellency the Governor;—

MY DEAR STR JAMSETII,—I have explained to you the reacconnected with my official position which would under almost any circumstances have prevented my taking any personal part in the proceedings to do honour to a colleague in the Council, who is remaining among us; and likely I hope to continue long to take an active, independent, and therefore useful share in the legislative duties of Government.

And you are also why I should have preferred any form of testimonial, which would be sufficiently in accordance with our European usage in honoring living men, to preclude all division of opinion, among the English friends of Mr. Sankarsett, regarding the most appropriate mode of testifying their respect for him.

But I should be very sorry if there any room for doubt to my entire concurrence, with you and your friends, in their opinion of the value of Mr. Jagannath Sankaraett's public services this community, in almost every way in which a gentleman of position can deserve well of his fellow-townsmen, and most especially in his unwavering, judicious and most effective support every thing connected with promotion of education, and especially a sum education, among his fellow-countrymen.

I should be sorry the grounds of the subjudgment, the comparative fitness of any particular form of testifying pect, to stand aloof from those gentlemen who agree with in desiring to express, in a formal and emphatic manner, our of Sankarsett's valuable public services.

will therefore add me reservation in begging you to enter my name me subscriber to the Sankarsett Testimonial.

[Bombay, Will December 1914]

The Annual Meeting of the Bombay Branch of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was held in the Town Hall under, the presidency of the Right Rev. John Harding D. D., the Lord Bishop of Bombay.

The Rev. C. D. DuPort, the Secretary, read the following from His Excellency the Governor;—

My Dear Mr DuPort,—I regret extremely that I shall be unable to attend the Meeting of the Diocesan Branch of the S. P. G. to-morrow, for I should have been glad of an opportunity of publicly knowledging obligations the Society, for the ready and effective response it has sent to request for aid, in ministering the wants of countrymen, who are scattered about the country, in such large and such rapidly increasing numbers, and few of whom within the reach of any existing pastoral charge.

I feel that what you have described to me a already undertaken as proposed by the Society will be productive of much good only by its direct effects, but by the hope it will hold out of pastoral supervision being hereafter extended to quarters which are of necessity not included in the first operations of the Society. For, I trust, the Society will not rest till it has provided the second of regular public worship, and system of regular periodical pastoral visiting, and of instruction for children, well so for adults who wish to be instructed, at every station where so countrymen permanently stationed, and where there is more yet no regular provision for public worship, or Christian schools.

Including, m such a scheme must, all the stations on min Railways, m which Europeans are habitually resident, and many large quarters of our towns and cantonments, where pensioners and others reside beyond the Chaplain's reach, this will require a great extension of the Society's operations. But less than this will, I am sure, not meet the necessities of the case, whether regards the wants of fine fellow-countrymen, the removal of the great reproach and obstacle to missionary success among the natives, which is raised by present grievous neglect of our fellow-Christians.

I feel sure, that if the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel will undertake the oversight of the work, and give its valuable aid in procuring Pastors and Teachers, the necessary pecuniary will not be wanting. Government will, myou me aware, gladly aid in m matter of such vital importance to the temporal and apiritual welfare of _____ of its most valued servants, and of a class to whom it owes much as to its pensioners—and I feel you may count on most effective aid, both in money, and in organisation for raising and applying it, from the lay members of your congregations throughout the country, who, I believe, very generally feel the deepest sympathy for the wants of their less-favoured countrymen, and who only require to be told how they me help, and to be assured that there is an organised agency ready to apply that which, for lack of time or opportunity, they may be unable to apply themselves for the relief of the spiritual destitution of their follow-countrymen and fellow Christians.

Believe me, &c.

eroposed Memorial II i Toyalty of the

-000-

To His Excellency Sir H. B. E. FREER, K. C. B., Governor of Bombay.

HONOURABLE SIR,—We the undersigned inhabitants of Bombay, being desirous of contributing memoration of the wealth of this city to the honour of our Queen, and anxious to erect some token of our love and respect for Her Majesty to mark the progress which India generally and Bombay in particular has made under her rule, and to show the loyalty of her Indian subjects throughout the Empire.

We consider that this our desire would most happily be fulfilled by the erection of Statues of Her Majesty and the late Prince Consort in a conspicuous part of Bombay.

The loyalty of Her Majesty's Indian people is sufficient guarantee that ample funds will be available for carrying out beject on the scale of magnificence it demands.

We therefore respectfully beg that your Excellency will permit us to write your as President of a Committee to consider the suitableness of a proposal and the best and of giving effect to an wishes.

REPLY TO THE FOREGOING.

To,

The Hon'ble Jagannath Sankarsett. Sir Jamsetji Jejeebhoy, Bart. The Hon'ble Rastamji Jamsetji Jejeebhoy. The Hon'ble Walter Richard Cassels.

When I had the honour of receiving the address in the Council Room at the Town Hall, I expressed my conviction that as regarded the first point there could be no question.

The propriety of devoting a portion of the wealth which flows into Bombay to express the loyalty of the inhabitants to Her Most Gracious Majesty, under whose rule this city has prospered an marvellously, hardly admits of a doubt, and the character of the gentlemen whose manual I find appended to the address is a sufficient guarantee that the object will be attempted with a spirit and on a scale every way worthy of an undertaking with which it is proposed to associate the manual of Her Most Gracious Majesty and the lamented Prince Consort.

With regard to the second point, the best second of giving effect to your wishes, I pointed out to you that it must mainly depend on the sum of money subscribed—and that, as the amount of subscription would in itself probably depend to the precise character style of the memorial, it may desirable, before proceeding further, to define the exactly what that character and style should be.

So large a sum there mentioned the estimate of the possible amount of the contributions, that I ventured further to suggest the Statues, the however magnificent a scale, could hardly fulfil your object, and that His Highness the Gaikwar, and lamented fellow towns-man the late Mr. David Sassoon, had already engaged to erect at their cost, and without any limit of expense, Statues of Her Majesty in her Coronation robes, and companion Statue of the Prince Consort, in the Victoria Gardens.

Their proposals on the subject were submitted through the Secretary of State for India to Her Majesty, and have been graciously approved, and I believe that a very eminent artist is makengaged in executing the Statues.

Bearing these facts in mind, it occurred to that the gentlewho signed the address may be glad to consider a suggestion which which to meet the object they have in view.

* His Highness Khanderso Gaikwar Khankheyi Shamsher Bahadoor, G. C. I., visited Bombay December III On the 5th January 1864, a Grand Durbar held Government House, Pavel, for Highness reception. During Highness stay here, many institutions received donations. His Highness Ba. 5,000 to the Victoria Gardens, and ordered Status Majesty Queen to be placed there in front of the Museum.

His Highness' communication Recellency Sir H. B. Frere, K. C. B., mbject, His Highness expressed his wish that "Her Majasty be represented to a throne, with all the ineignia of royalty, under a canopy, and that meach it is four man of the pedestal than should be inecription, in manager, in the following effect:—

VICTORIA B.

Dedicated by

GAIKWAB,

Sens Khas-Kheyl Bahadoor, Kaight Grand Commander of the Land Exalted Order of Landis,

its total cost including all charges will be about two Laos of rupess.

⁺ The Statue of the Prince Commit will be as magnificent and stately as that iff Majesty the Queen. This is also entrusted to Mr. Noble.

You that Government now rebuilding the European General Hospital, and you from the papers lately published by the Government of India, that we propose saide for this purpose, a sum of upwards of 10 lacs of Rupees, partly from the sale of the site of the old Hospital, and partly from the general Fund realized by the sale of land in and the Fort.

But assured that even this aum, large at it is, will not suffice for all the wants of the Principal European Hospital of Bombay, and it makes to me that the object of the gentlemen who signed the address could not be better fulfilled than by devoting the sum they are willing to spend in extending, completing, and endowing that Hospital in a style worthy to be associated with the honoured seems of Her Majesty and the late Prince Consort.

The patients in the Hospital are generally European sailors and soldiers, who must with their regiments or Depots; military pensioners, European mechanics, and others, employed in the railway, &c.; and other Europeans of all professions, must those who belong to any particular regiment in the army, and there are also families of all these classes.

The patients of all ranks, and there many amongst them who would not ask for admission into public Hospital not the friendless and houseless condition of so many Europeans in country render this Hospital the only means of obtaining good medical advice and attendance.

Hence it will be that the classes, for whose benefit the Hospital is designed, comprise those to whose exertions the present wealth and prosperity of Bombay are specially due, and who have thus peculi we claim the gratitude and good offices of all, Natives well Europeans, interested in Bombay its prosperity.

But the Hospital is more particularly for the benefit of the poorer and more friendless classes, in whose welfare Her Majesty [10] [10] Prince Consort ever manifested a deep and most active interest.

The recent information concerning this is that detailed plans and estimates for the new European General Respital which will cost from 20 to 15 hos of Ea., have not yet been received by Government; the general design however has been approved.

I magine therefore no memorial which could so well fulfil an object of great practical utility, at the most time that it would be in entire accordance with the spirit of active benevolence which actuated the late Prince Consort, and with the feelings of her Majesty, as a thoroughly well constructed and well managed Hospital for Europeans, in which the sailors of Her commercial Marine, the ponsioned soldiers of Hor army, and the mechanics who carry the arts and industry of Her British Dominions to the extremities of Her vast Empire, would be properly cared for in their hours of sickness in this foreign climate.

The architectural design for the Hospital might be membellished as to fulfil the specific object indicated in your address and thus render the building worthy alike of its object and of the magnificent site which it will occupy. It might then be designated "The Royal Victoria and Albert Hospital." Its entrance Hall might contain Statues of Her Majesty and Prince Albert, differing in treatment from those in the Victoria Gardens, and adorned with has reliefs and other accessories, commemorating those traits of compassionate sympathy for the sufferings of Her subjects which have so greatly endeared Her Majesty's name to all the varied races over which she rules.

Any funds which might remain, after enlarging and embellishing the Building, might be devoted to endowing the Hospital, and providing for such medical and other attendants of the Hospital as are not included in the ordinary Government establishment of such institutions.

Should these suggestions meet with the concurrence of the gentlemen who signed the address, and should the amount of subscriptions be sufficient to justify the change of and the necessary additions to and alterations in the present plans of the Hospital, I would propose that Government should nominate a Commission comprising, in addition to the Government nominees, Architects, Medical men, &c., a number of non-official gentlemen, selected by the memorialists, who should be charged to confer with the Government members regarding the character and extent of the additions to be made to the proposed Building, and also regarding the permanent management of Hospital when completed, Hospital when completed, Hospital when it, in every respect, equal to the best establishments of the kind in the great cities of Europe and America-

The report of such a Commission would put the subject in a form sufficiently defined to admit of its being submitted through the Secretary of State for Her Majesty's approval.

I have the honour to be, &c.

H. B. E. FRERE.

P. S.—Should the Subscribers to the address finally decide a group of Statuary, I need hardly add that I will gladly co-oper—in any manner that may seem desirable with a view to render the work worthy of its object.

The Bombay Agri-Horticultural Fociety.

[Bombay, 17th July 1865.]

A meeting of the above Society was held in the Town Hall to devise meeting its accumulated debt of Rs. 16,217, and the prospective monthly deficit of Rs. 400.* The President read the following letter from His Excellency the Governor;—

President of the Agri-Horticultural Society of Western India.

My Dear Sir,— I have read, with real pain, Dr. Birdwood's letters to Government and to the Municipal Commissioner, the subject of the present and prospects of the Victoria Gardens. I am sure you, so one of the oldest Members and President of the Agri-Horticultural Society, will agree with me that it is a great reproach to every one of us who is, officially otherwise, connected with Bombay, that the Secretary, to whom the Society, and its gardens owe so much, should be obliged to make such appeal; and that it is a very great public misfortune, that such an appeal, when made, should be ineffectual.

I trust that, regards both the Government and the Municipality, this inability to help the gardens is only temporary. Viewed merely as open, healthy place of public resort and recreation, the gardens have strong claim Municipal support, and the state of the Municipal Funds will not long, hope, remain such to make it simply impossible, as it is just now, to recognize such claims.

The gardens have also, I think, established, on still higher grounds, a claim to recognition by Government as an important adjunct to the Museum. It is too late, this year, to bring the question of any increase of the Government allowance before the Government of India, but I hope, when the time comes for preparing the next estimates, we may be able to entertain the application.

^{*} debt paid by public subscriptions and from amount raised from other

But nothing which we be expected from either Government the Municipality, will obviate the necessity for increased subscriptions from the public; and the immediate question which presses is, how we the gardens to be supported for the next six of twelve months?

I am told that you have successfully—for the time at least—resisted proposal for closing the gardens partially if not entirely, and I now write, mone who has always taken a warm interest in the Society, to you, as its President, and one of its earliest, most consistent, and liberal supporters, to express my satisfaction that such an act of burbarism has been for the time averted, and to say how confident I feel that when the state of the case is fully known to the leading men in Bombay, they will unite with you to prevent that which would reflect lasting discredit mall belonging to Bombay.

I multiple to communicate personally with Mr. Cowasji Jehanghier, Mr. Mangaldus Nathubhoy, and our excellent colleague, Mr. Rastainji Jamsetji and others, who have hitherto done m much for the Society, and its gardens, and I must, therefore, trust to you to explain to them the views I have me very briefly and imperfectly expressed to you. I feel sure they will not allow you to stand alone in this good work.

Believe me, &c.

P. S.—Should any subscription be opened — Monday, I shall be obliged if you will put my name down for Rs. 500.

Grant Medical College.

[Bombay, 10th January 1866.]

The Honourable Claudius James Erskine, who presided the Annual Distribution of Diplomas and Prizes to the successful students of the above College, read the following letter from His Excellency the Governor;—

"I shall be very much obliged to you if you will express to Dr. Haines* and to the Professors of the Grant Medical College my regret at not being able to attend their annual meeting. There one or two subjects regarding which I should have been particularly glad of an opportunity of making open remarks.

Dr. Robort Haines, Principal of the Grant Medical College, died in the 26th April 1866. In him the University of Bombay lost one of its brightest ornaments, Dr. W. G. Hunter in his Annual Report of the College for 1867, alludes to indeath in the following words;—

"In the staff of the College great changes have to be recorded. Before, however, proceeding to notice them in detail, I would in a few words briefly refer to the great loss which this Institution has sustained through the sad and untimely death of its late Principal, Dr. Haines. His rare abilities, his varied and extensive knowledge and unassuming manners, caused him to be held in high respect and esteem by classes of the community. In Chemistry, to which he had devoted many years of untiring energy, he stood, I believe, without a rival in this country; and had his life been spared be would in all probability have taken rank among some of the foremost men in Europe. Connection with this College extended over a period of nearly 17 years, and the chairs which he held with such distinguished ability it has been found no easy matter to creditally fill. Always delicate physical organization, his health at length encounded to his devotion to hard study and too prolonged residence in trying climate.

gives much pleasure to state that in acknowledgment of his labours amongst mus project, having a double object in view, has been set on foot—one, the placing must marble Bust in the College, the other of providing for the scientific literary education music eldest son."

"The marble Bust of Dr. Haines, has been received from England, and worthily occupies a niche in the vestibule # the College."

I wished to tell them what gratifying evidence I found during my late tour in the Southern Maratha Country, on many previocosions, of the extent to which the results of their noble Institution are visible, in very remote parts of the country.

I found in almost every market town where I had an opportunity of inquiring, more or less proof that the people generally are becoming aware of the great value to them of medical science at taught at the Grant Medical College. I found that a Dispensary under the charge of a medical practitioner from the College are everywhere of the first things the people desired when they established municipal institutions, and that the opening of such a dispensary of the most frequent forms in which the liberality of native Chiefs and men of property inclined to shew itself.

If Mr. Ellis is able to attend the meeting, he will, I we sure, be able to give you instances of this both from what we have lately seen in the Southern Maratha Country and from his former experience in other parts of the country.

It with great regret that heard at several important towns that the people had subscribed money and taken every other step required of them towards the establishment of a dispensary; but that owing to the paucity of qualified Graduates of the Grant Medical College, Government had been unable to do their part by appointing a Sub-Assistant Surgeon to the charge of it, and that consequently the dispensary had not yet been opened.

I need not tell you that it is no fault of our Government that such obstacles should occur. We all know that the prospects of rapid advancement for well educated young men are, in Bombay, so good in other walks of life, that the medical profession for the time—and I hope only for a time—fails to attract a sufficient number of students to supply the demand for qualified Graduates. Something may be done to increase the present numbers if assent be given to the plan we have submitted for improving the position of the Sub-Assistant Surgeons, but not much as is required to supply the wants of the Mofussil, unless we can attract to the College students whose homes are in the Mofussil, and who look returning thither to practice completing their medical education.

Hitherto have been very much dependent on Bombay and Poona for medical students; but it is not to be expected that young men whose homes and friends at the motropolitan cities will voluntarily bury themselves in the comparative exile of small towns in the Mofnssil. Here, in Europe, the country families must for the most part supply the students, who for Graduwill be the country practitioners. Young men must come to Bombay other large towns, where alone in the great hospitals they can thoroughly study their profession. Some will probably remain and try to push their way in the competition of metropolitan practice, but many more will be glad to return to their homes and be content in the neighbourhood of their own families, with a more moderate share of professional success than would have satisfied them away from their provinces.

It is a question which I trust will engage the early attention of the Principal of the College and the Director of Public Instruction, how a can facilitate this process. The great obstacle is of course the expense of living in Bombay, while going through the college course, and I have a doubt that some plan may be devised which would enable provincial municipalities as well private philanthropists to aid the provincial students in going through the necessary manner of medical study in Bombay.

Mean time we have most valuable auxiliary resource in the Vernacular Class. Many of the man advanced pupils would no doubt be found fully qualified for the charge of a Dispensary in a country town. Indeed, I may excellent Dispensary recently established. Karar, superintended by Mr. Ramchandra Daji, one of the earliest students, I believe, of the Vernacular Class; and I may be to believe it was doing a great amount of good. I would by no man advocate being content with anything but thoroughly educated men; but looking to the difficulty of getting a supply of such men adequate to may rapidly increasing wants, we may gladly avail ourselves of the usoful substitute afforded by the Vernacular Class."

Andrew's Dinner, Bombay.

[Bombay, 30th November 1866.]

The Honourable A. J. Hunter, who presided the occasion, said;—
Gentlemen,—Our next toust is me which I am sure only requires mention to be received with enthusiasm: it is—"The Governor of Bombay."

I feel that it is quite unnecessary to say anything in support of this tosat. as the great services which Sir Bartle Frere has rendered to this country during his long residence in India so well known to all of you that me remarks of mone are measury to recall them to your recollection. I will only allude to the well timed and efficient aid which in 1857, while Commissioner in Sind, he afforded in quelling the mutiny and preventing it from extending to this Presidency, -- aid which recognised in a fitting by Her Majesty's Government to the eminent service which he rendered in the discharge of his duties in the Council of the Governor General; and to the progress which our own Presidency has made during the past five years under his fostering cure. I need not do _____ than refer to the encouragement to education which His Excellency's Government has all times afforded; to the improvement in architecture; to the promotion of public works; and to the furtherance of every popular undertaking calculated to advance the interests of this country, both - regards Europeans and Natives, -as a general indication of the policy he has sursued and the lasting name he has made in the annals of this country. He is a shout to leave in for an important position in England, where his experience and ability will continue to be useful in a high degree to this country; and is matter of congratulation that in losing if from her midst, India is not altogether losing the benefit of experience and judgment.

I wery corry that he has been unable to be present with us evening, and more sorry account of the cause. The letter which I hold in my hand, and which I will now read to you, will fully explain the cause of absence from us;—

Parell, 30th November

DEAR MR. HUNTER,—I have been very unwilling is give up the hope that I might be well enough to be present in the Town Hall this evening. But I regret to say I am still unable to put my foot to the ground in walking, to the without crutches. I must therefore beg you to make my apology to our hosts, and to say how sincerely I regret that my total inability to stand, or to sit at table, will prevent my being present at St. Andrew's dinner this evening.

I heartily trust the revival of that time-honoured institution may be a great success, and only wish I could be present to meet once more so many whom I highly respect and value, to be reminded of the Scotchmen to whom Bombay owes so much, not only as soldiers and statesmen, great merchants and divines, but in many numerous walks of life, the theirans and mechanics of our factories and steam flotillas, wells if our Mackintoshes and Malcolms, our Outrams and our Eiphir Sines.

More especially I should have recalled with pleasure the memory of many personal friends, some of them of early days, and others who still are bearing with us the burdens and the pleasures of busy life, my regards for whom would, to me, hallow the name of Scotland, even if she had never produced one of that long roll of great men whose fame is now matienal property of our United Empire.

Believe me, &c.

H. B. E. FRERE.

Gentlemen (said the Chairman,) I ask you to join with me in drinking to the Governor of Bombay.

The Reverend John Wilson, D. D., F. R. s.

[Bombay, 15th February 1869.]

At a large and influential meeting of Europeans and Natives which was held in the Town Hall for the purpose of presenting address and testimonial* to the Rev. Dr. John Wilson, the Right Honourable Sir Seymour Fitz Gerald, G. C. S. I_{sred}'overnor of Bombay, who presided at the occasion, nead the foolt ving letter from Sir Henry Bartle Edward Frere, G. C. S. I., K. (ectie.

DEAR SIR-I have had the pleasure to receive from you papers regarding a testimonial to Dr. Wilson a token of the esteem and regard of his fellow-citizens, and of his friends in India and elsewhere.

I have sent a small subscription to Messrs. Smith, Flewing and Co., but I should be sorry if my regard for Dr. Wilson and my high estimation of the great service he has done in so many ways for India, mess measured by any subscription; myou well know they far exceed anything that can be estimated by any material value.

I have known Dr. Wilson slmost from the day when I landed in India, and there is man now living for whom I must truly say that my regard for him has grown with every year that has passed, as time brought fresh proof of the great value of the spirit in which they were rendered.

"A sum of about Rupees thirty thomsand was subscribed for by the numerous friends and admirers of Dr. Wilson, both in India, and England, the interest whereof, to see the words of the Address which sees presented to him, be used by Dr. Wilson during his life-time in aid of his literary pursuits, and that ahall be ultimately bequesthed by for the furtherance of philological studies in connection with the University of Bombay in such the way appoint; desiring thereby to express their own sense of his worth, the to secure, that the memory of his labours amongst them

To you in Bombay, though you have not known him - long as I have, it would be quite superfluous to say anything regarding the extraordinary variety and value of the services which Dr. Wilson has rendered to India. His direct services to the cause of religion. education, and literature, are some or less well known to every one of those who will be present at your meeting in February, but I know of few who have done so much indirect good service to the cause of civilisation and good government in Western India as Dr. Wilson. His whole life has been an striking example of what a selfdenying Christian ought to be, and he has done more than any I know, to show the educated and thinking portion of the native community, that the highest form of Christianity is perfectly compatible with love for their country and their people and with patriotic devotion to that great empire to which the destinies of India have been entrusted. I carnestly hope for the sake of Bombay that the meeting in February will be like ____ other meetings I have known in your island, an example India and something of which men of every race, class, and creed, who wish well to India, may feel proud.

Believe me, &c.

Farewell Address, Finenchi.

-- 000-----

The following Address was presented to the Honourable Sir H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B., Commissioner in Sind, by the Native Community of Karachi, on his appointment as Member of the Supreme Council of India.

TO THE HONOVEREL SIR HEART BARTLE EDWARD FREEE, K. C. B., CONVESSORER IN SING.

It is with mincled feelings of deep gratitude and sorrow that we, the Native Community of Narachi, re-pectfully beg to approach you, to attempt an expression of our sentiments towards you on your approaching departure from a Province, which has been so long under your rule, and parting with a people for whose social and moral amelioration you have laboured for the last nine years, with a ability and which have been surpassed by few Indian Statesmen.

To attempt an enumeration of the innumerable boons, unknown before, and conferred, through your indebdigable exertions, on the inhabitants of Sind, would be to attempt a simple impossibility. But we cannot resist the temptation of touching on the following, as among the many blesangs we have enjoyed under your long and illustrious rule.

With complete success you have upheld the cause of "Justice," and "Peace," the first seeds of which were sown by the master-hand that by a few years had preceded you—we mean the late and great Sir Charles Napier, K. C. B.

Administrative reforms, mecessary in any Province recently conquered, and particularly so in Sind, involving methey did meany complicated class and individual interests, have been successfully effected with completeness and tact almost without ministance of a detriment to the "vested interests" of the classes concerned—in fact, with meabsence of unpopularity unparalleled in the history of any of the newly conquered Provinces of India.

On the fiscal reforms — brought — bear your long departmental experience, thereby largely adding to — revenue of the country and — a duced rate of the land tax to an — unknown before.

Works of public utility received your first attention, and, among them, this Province —— can boast its Travellers' Bangalows, Dharmashalas, School-houses, Roads leading almost to every hamlet, Tanks, Wells, great Canals, like the Narra and the Fullialce Cats, Itiver Steamers, Harbour Improvements, Electric Telegraphs, and last, though not least, the Railway.

Talking of the Railway, we cannot but express our great regret—a regret in which — feel sure our friends of that Department, especially the energetic and public-spirited Agent and the Chief Engineer, will join with us,—that we are likely to be deprived of the pleasure of your presence at the consummation of a work of which you are not only the originator, but the moving spring, and which is being rigorously presecuted, and brought so nearly, and in — short a time, to completion.

Under your blessed rule, Commerce of this Province has received such powerful impetus, and it has so rapidly multiplied itself from year to year, that we fear Bombay itself has begun to feel jealous and uneasy the rapid strides which the fear bombay itself has begun to feel jealous and uneasy of the world has made under your memorable administration. This feeling of jealousy and ancasiness is certainly unreasonable, as even when the one attains the importance and prosperity of the other, as we are sure it will no distant time, both will have occupied entirely different fields, and thus rather assist each other's advancement.

It is to your own exertions, assisted by able Officers under you, that this Province is indebted for its Municipal Institutions. While larger Towns in the older Provinces — still without the benefit of a Municipal Government, Sind can boast not only of having Municipalities established in Towns, large and small, but having them in the most properous condition. This fact itself speaks how admirable and consummate are your administrative abilities, and how anxious you are — promote every kind of local improvement.

Education has found in you its warmest advocate and active supporter. The wholesale and unjust denunciations hurled against it from certain quarters as one of the principal though indirect and of the late lamentable revolt in Hindustan, have aided to alter your views respecting it, and you have always held that there cannot be a greater enemy than Ignorance to the State, well as to the enlightenment of the people of any country. And despite of every discouragement, consequent as the bloody events of 1857—58, one could easily trace a marked and steady, nay, rather a rapid, progress of Native Education in Sind under your fostering care, as apparent from the doubled, and in manifestances trebled, number of English well Vernacular Schook, nearly a self-supporting system, advocated in the memorable Despatch of 1854* by present worthy Secretary of State for India, but fully anticipated and successfully introduced in Sind by yourself, with the able and energetic assistance of friends Mr. B. H. Ellis and Major F. J. Goldsmid. Your success in this branch of administration has been unparalleled that it has led to invidious comparisons in the public journals, to the disparagement of more than one quarter of the Indian empire. Among other public journals, in of its recent issues the "New Panjaubee" concludes its remarks on the subject with this flattering observation—" With Sir Bartle Frere in Lahore, our School in Amerkelly would have made better progress than it has done."

While rebellion was stalking in other parts of India, you not only preserved a profound tranquility throughout this Province, but were able to send succour to those places where it was most needed. Your important services at that crisis have been already rewarded by our august and illustrious Savereign, by conferring on you the Dignity of the most honorable Order of the Bath. With what heartfelt and sincere joy this elevation of yours was viewed by all classes of the Native Community of Sind be guessed from the many public rejoicings held in every part of the Province to celebrate that mapicious event.

In short, your Government has been so just and conciliatory that it has led us to look upon you as our Patriarch, and in the enjoyment of the happiness of your rule we almost forgot, that a day must were when abilities and success like yours will remove you from among us to a position of higher importance. It is, therefore, no wonder that, though rejoicing at your promotion, we should feel the more acutely the shock of so sudden a parting with you. Perhaps you cannot at present fully know the extent to which your good qualities, your knowledge of the secret of gaining the hearts of the Natives of India, and of governing them by the sole power of Justice and Love, have endeared you to the people of this Province, and made you popular, alike among | classes of the country, Natives | well as Europeans. Countrymen as well as Foreigners. But had your route lain through the P. svince, instead of by sea, we are sure you would have found every step of your way crowded by a sorrowing populace. From the ariatocracy of the land down to the humblest fisherman, every soul would have deserted their pleasure and their daily labor, and flocked round you to give vent to the outpourings of their hearts. You would have met with but weeping and sorrowing faces on the sudden parting with their deservedly beloved and revered ruler. But you are saved such an affecting week. However, feel sure that you will yet hear of their grief on learning that their benefactor, whose ever-smiling face annually brightened every villager's homestead with a visit, from Karachi up to Kusmore, and the Thur to the remotest corner of the Hill regions, has suddenly left them, with but a slender hope of ever seeing him again.

But we fear we are trying your patience by the length of this Address, and would therefore say, in conclusion, that if Her Majesty's Government want to select from among the Indian Statesmen was who possesses the key of the secret of touching and winning the hearts of men of different creeds and castes of which the Native Society of this country is composed, by the power of Love and not of Fear, they should look to you, and to you alone. You have appreciated and illustrated the *Power of Love" to its fullest extent in your administration of this Province. There would not have thoroughly mastered them, feeling you do that we have all of more human heart." We therefore pany for the sake of his Province that may God give your successor (J. D. Invermity, Eqs., C. S., | the will and the strength to tread in your footsteps, and if he only does this, he will have done all the good that it is in the power of  to effect.

Although your connexion with Sind is about to cease, by your appointment to a seat in the Supreme Council of Indis, we hope, by the grace of the Almighty, to you, at no distant day, occupying a still higher position, and exercising a direct control this Province, thus having better opportunities of carrying on the good work you have commenced here.

In the meanwhile, we wish you and Lady Frere a safe and happy voyage to Calcutta, where, we fervently pray, you may be in the enjoyment of health and prosperity.

Gentlemen, and all my Nativo Friends—I need not you with what sincere gratification I have received the Address you have m kindly presented to me in which you allude, in terms much flattering than I deserve, to some of the principal subjects at which I have laboured during my sojourn in this Province. I felt especially gratified at your opinion of the good effects of what has been done for the promotion of Commerce, where we opinion coming from those who represent the principal commercial marts of this Province is especially valuable. Without participating in your fears with regard to the feelings with which this place is regarded by the mercantile world in Bombay, I may express my hope that the great commercial metropolis of Western India will have no cause to be ashamed of her progeny that she may find both honour and profit in the prosperity of Karachi, and that we, in Karachi, may in our maturity repay our parent city for any trouble and anxiety we may have caused her in our youth.

You have alluded to the Municipalities which have been singularly prosperous in this Province, and to the Schools which owo much to the support of the Municipalities. I trust in these two classes of Institutions -in the habits of local self-government which fostered by the one, and the education which is given by the other-vou have the means of advancing to a pitch of civilisation far exceeding any thing that has been and of late years in India. and quite equal to that period when the great and wise men of Western Europe looked to the East for models to imitate in many branches of art and civilisation. My friend Sabar Ali Shah knows that in his own city (Tatta,) they have the remains of arts and learning derived from the best period of Indian history, and I trust we shall, at - distant day, surpass - them. The feature which gives the strongest grounds for hope, both in your Municipal and Educational Institutions, is the warm interest which you vourselves take in the matter. Men like yourselves, Mr. Svad Amognoodin, Sabar Ali Shah, Sett Naomal, Mr. Jagannath Sadashivaji, Mr. Mahadeva Shastree, and many others, not only take a deep personal interest in the matter, but devote their own time, energy, and money to the promotion of these objects. For let me assure you that nothing effects I can be attained without such per onal exertions and sacrifics. The gentlemen to whom you have m justly alluded as the great promoters of Education. Mr. Ellis and Major Goldsmid, can do no on behalf of Government the . direct and stimulate your own voluntary exertions, and it is the admirable mode in which this has been done that entitles them to special gratitude.

You have alluded to the immunity from disturbance which this Province enjoyed during the past two troubled years, and you have justly said that our safety min no small degree owing to the loyalty of the inhabitants of Sind. Throughout that period the population generally was so contented and well disposed, that I never had any serious anxiety on the subject of the popular foeling, but we must not forget how much, under Providence. owed to the invaluable legacy of that great man, the first Governor of Sind, in the admirable Police first organized by Sir Charles Napier, and which is now, I am happy to say, being imitated in more than Province of India. It was, me we all remember, in m small degree owing to our confidence in the Police, well directed by my friends Major Marston, Captain Pirie, and Khan Bahadoor Shaik Gulam Hoossein, that we were able, by God's blessing, to aleep free from all the anxiety which disturbed other parts of India, that we went about our ordinary avocations in peace and quietness, and that throughout that eventful period, though attempts were repeatedly made in different places to excite insurrection, no public office was closed for a single day, our ordinary commercial dealings were interrupted, and community kept for more than a part of a single night out of their beds, in consequence of any of the abortive attempts at insurrection.

I could have wished that I was been able to express myself greater length to those of my Native friends who do not understand English but I have already detained you longer than I intended, and I regret that indisposition prevents my saying all I would wish.

Sir Bartle Frere then addressed the Native Community in Hindustani, and told them that he trusted to the day when any one who, like himself, could not address them with Native fluency in their own language, would find that all who knew him understood enough of English to follow his meaning in that language.

In thanking them for all they had said of the amount of his exortions for their welfare, he reminded them that he had done no more than the Queen and the British nation required of all, who sent to govern in this country. He need not remind them of the way Sir Charles Napier used to work for the public good. They had known Mr. Pringle, Major Preedy, their present Collector Mr. Bollasis, Captain John Dunsterville, and many others, whom he now saw around him; they had seen how these gentlemen, though in high positions, devoted their whole energy to the duties of their office, laboring night-and day to do their duty conscientiously, and not to enjoy the ease which they might otherwise have found in self-indulgence. Others, like their friends Dr. Grierson, with no special duty imposed on them, voluntarily devoted themselves to every work of benevolence. Men who, like Akhoond Hubeeb Oolla, had been in England, knew that it the same with all our public man there, and he (Sir Bartle) trusted. that they would always find it so with all who may man here in the service of Government, and that they would find a constant cession of equally devoted public Officers to represent the British Government in this Province. He looked with especial hope to the good effects of the presence of that highly qualified body of gentlemen connected with the Railway, and other great undertakings of the kind.

Finally, he thanked them of for their uniform kind feeling towards himself, especially as shown that magnificient entertainment, expressed hope that God would prosper them, and show them all that so good and that true, and hade them Farewell.

Congratulatory Addresses.

----0000-----

His Excellency Sir II. B. E. Frere, K. C. B., on his appointment as Governor of Bombay held a Durbar in the Town Hall for the reception of the principal Native Gentlemon of this City. After this was over, Sir Jamsetji Jejoebhoy addressed him as follows;—

Hon'ble Sir,— With your Excellency's kind permission I will read a short Address of congratulation as your appointment to the Governorship of this Presidency, which has been signed by a large number of the native inhabitants of Bombay. Your Excellency's presence amongst us in the high position which you now hold is regarded with feelings of the highest gratification by all classes of the community, and by none in a higher degree than the native portion of the society of Bombay who have been so long acquainted with you, that they cannot but look upon you are old and kind friend coming amongst them again, and this must be their are for departing from the usual custom in the presentation of the Address, which I will now read.

TO THE HONOURABLE SIR H. B. E. FRERE, K. C. B.,

Hon'ble Sir,—We, the undersigned native inhabitants of Bombay, beg to offer you bearty congratulations on your appointment to the government of this Presidency, and we cordially and sincerely welcome you to the scene of your future labours.

Your long and intimate acquaintance with the people whom you how called upon to rule, and the characteristics of your past public career justify us in entertaining the most hopeful expectations from your government of the capital of Western India, and this rapidly increasing Presidency.

We need not detain you by entering on a review of the various grades of the public service through which you have passed with such distinction. Suffice it to say, that, in all the important situations which you have held, you have uniformly directed your best efforts to the smelioration of the condition of the various races with whom you have some in contact, and that your eminent public services have been appreciated and recognized by sovereign.

Individually, therefore, and as a community, me hail with joy your appointment to the highest office in this Presidency.

We feel sure that in you interests will be promoted, and that under your administration interests will be promoted, and that from an impartial and generous policy which, doubt not, will be firmly maintained in your future public career, the most beneficial results will follow.

Ferrently hoping that you may have much health to conduct the labours of your administration of this Presidency, respectfully subscribe ourselves, Hon'ble Sir, your most faithful servants.

On the same day, His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, K. C. B., received from Karachi the following Address;—

TO

GOVERNOR - BOMBAY.

HONOURABLE SIR,

THE UNDERSIGNED NATIVE INHABITANTS OF KARACHI, beg most respectfully offer Your Excellency heartfelt and sincere congratulations your succeeding to the Government of the Presidency of Bombay.

It may be within your recollection that at the conclusion of the address which had the honor of presenting Your Exculance the time of your departure from this place, we stated, although your connection

Sind is about to cease by your appointment to meant in the Supreme Council of India, make hope, by the grace of the Almighty, to see you at no distant day, occupying a still higher position and exercising a direct control over this Province, thus having better opportunities of carrying must be good work you have commenced here." This hope did not rest on mere conjecture, nor was it simply mecompliment, but it rested on our deep-rooted conviction that the eminent qualities, which conspired to render your administration of Sind so popular and illustrious, and which have caused and will cause your name to be held in grateful remembrance by the present and future generations, could not but raise Your Excellency to a more elevated position than the make you occupied at Calcutta. And make have the highest satisfaction of seeing that make hope by the blessing of GOD, has been realized.

We watched, with grateful interest, your mann in the Supreme Council of India, and we had the pleasure of knowing from time to time that it was marked with that liberality of spirit, even-handed justice, benevolence of heart, and anxiety for the well-being of our countrymen, which always characterised your rule over as. Your advocacy and maintenance of equality in the eyes of the law between classes of Her Marker's Subjects, and your principal share in the preparation of those noble measures which distinguished the latter part of the reign of the great statesman, the late Viceror of India, and which best calculated to promote to unexampled degree the prosperity and happiness of the people, have particular claims upon our gratifude. But what has been of peculiar gratification ourselves, is the fact that in the midst of the cares of the Empire you bore the welfare of this Province at heart, much as when you were its immediate ruler.

That Your Excellency has been entrusted with the Government of important portion of Hen Majerty's magnificent empire in the East, thereby having the destinies of millions of your fellow-creatures committed to your fostering care, is another proof of the anxiety of Hen Majerty's Gotto select to such an exalted post "one who possesses the key of the secret of touching and winning the hearts of men of different creeds and castes of which the Native Society of this country is composed by the power of Love and not of Fear."

^{*} This principle of equality before the law sum advocated by Sir H. B. E. Frere in two which were then before the Legislative Council of India in 1860; viz, Enquiry respecting amenability of British Subjects to mofussil Criminal Courts and Arms Ammunition Bill.—Vide proceedings of the Legislative Council of India, Vol. VI, pp. 3 and 833—834.

Judging from your past career, we are strongly impressed with the belief that your administration of the Presidency will be most glorious one, not for achievement of new conquests mannexation of kingdoms, but for the universal contentment which is sure me be produced by your measures, based, as they will be, on the grand maxim of Political wisdom that India should be governed for the sole benefit of her children—a maxim followed in its highest sense by men of such imperishable renown me Elphinstone, Malcolm, and Nunno, and very recently by the high-minded nobleman, the Earl Canalogs.

Now that Your Excellency has a vast and independent sphere of action, we are induced to hope that the generous intentions of our august Sourceson, as announced in that ever-memorable document—the Royal Proclamation of 1858—which we may justly call the Magna Charta of our Liberties and Privileges, will be carried out to their fullest extent.

And _____ in conclusion, we fervently pray = the Supreme Ruler that Your Excellency may be long spared = rule over us, and to enjoy still higher honors that may be in store for you in the boson of your family and friends in your native country.

Farewell Addresses.

The following Farewell Address on behalf of the Chiefs and Siedans of the Docesu and Southern Maratha Country was presented to His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., on his approaching departure to England, by the Honourable Shriniwas Rhoji Rho Shhob Pant Pratinidhi.

To H. E. Sir Henry Barrle Edw and Friend, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., Governor of Bombay.

Your Excellency,—We, the Chiefs and Sirdars of the Deccan and Southern Marutha Country, having a-sembled at this ancient capital in accordance with a time-honoured custom, to do honour to your Excellency as the representative of our Most Granous Sovereign, cannot take the leave the last occasion perhaps which we shall have the happiness of meeting your Excellency, without offering you the humble tribute of our esteem and admiration for the eminent public services which you have rendered to our country during a long and honourable career extending over more than thirty years.

It to me a source of sincere gratification that while your Excellency's earliest fame me a Civil Servant of the Government of India me acquired in our own provinces, and amongst our me people, we have lived to witness the latest mark of me Sovereign's favour conferred on your Excellency while directing the government of the Presidency in which above all others you must ever continue to feel a deep personal interest.

It is our conviction that the high position which your Excellency has attained as Governor of Western India, is but a fitting acknowledgment of the earnest efforts made by you, from your first coming amongst us, to promote our happiness and well-being, by a patient study of the languages, manners, and for country, and by a warm sympathy and free intercourse with classes with whom you have been brought in contact.

Called cocupy a seat in the Council of the Governor General during one of the most memorable epochs in the history of India, your Excellency's name became once associated with that of the much-lamented Earl Canning in those political and legislative measures which largely contributed to restore peace and happiness many distracted provinces, and to knit by indissoluble ties the feelings of Chiefs and people throughout the British Crown.

It can never be forgotten by us that, while bitter feelings still ming high in many parts of India, your Excellency, as a member of the Indian Legislature, stood prominent in maintaining the equal rights of all classes before the law; and the firmness so displayed during a period of strong popular excitement, confirmed in the hearts of Chiefs and people those strong feelings of loyal trust in the Viceroy and his Councillors which have not been, and will not soon be, effaced.

We shall always look back with unalloyed satisfaction to the five years of your Excellency's rule as Governor of these provincesn period marked in an unexampled degree by the prosperity and contentment of Chiefs and Landholders throughout the country. Much of this prospenty, we are aware, is due to the prosperity which flowed in upon us owing to the large demands on the cotton-fields of India during the late civil war in America; but we should be ungrateful if we did not acknowledge also how much is due to the untiring efforts made by your Excellency to improve the apportunity for our benefit, by urging the extension of works of public utility, and encouraging the labours, and hopes of the cultivating classes throughout the Presidency. The great advance of the people in material welfare is most apparent in the large and increasing contributions now made by them towards the diffusion of normalar instruction, and the introduction of municipal improvements in their towns and villages. The efforts of the people in this direction have been wisely guided by your Excellency, under whose fostering care many be said the spirit of municipal grovernment has revived - this side of India.

As a staunch advocate of the cause of liberal education in India, your Excellency has lost me opportunity of advancing it in any way, the fruits of which me everywhere visible in the High Schools established at all the principal stations in the Presidency, and in the noble edifices which me being reared in Tomboy and Poona for the accommodation of our rapidly increasing College Classes.

We view your Excellency's departure from India an irreparable loss to ourselves, to many of whom you known as a tried personal friend, by whose counsels we have been guided and cheered during many years of unrestricted intercourse. No in India, believe, knows better than your Excellency the true feelings aspirations of its Chiefs and Sirdars, and the best suited to maintain and elevate their positions in the Empire.

The gracious assurances of Her Majesty the Queen that the hereditary rights and possessions will be continued unimpaired to successors for all time, have relieved us of anxiety for the future welfare and dignity of houses; but your Excellency, fully sensible that the happiness will not be complete until we can fit ourselves to share in the government by which we are protected, has never ceased arging on us the importance of providing suitably for the aducation of children as a means towards this great end. Already a few of us have been selected to fill offices of trust and honour under the British Government, and it is munited and carnest prayer that your Excellency may long be spared, your return to your native land, to foster, by your advice in the Council of India, this beneficent policy, and to promote, by your large and varied knowledge, and by an experience acquired in almost every part of India, the true happiness of our countrymen and the honour of the Grown.

We would request your Excellency's permission to place in the Government House Poons, as a memento of high regard for your many public and private virtues, a life-size State Portrait, (painted by Mr. Theodore Jansen, an artist of European celebrity) of your Excellency, the familiar lineaments of which will remind and our children of one who has proved himself in the highest public stations a true friend and protector of the Chiefs and People of India.*

In wishing your Excellency farewell, we desire to offer a heartfelt prayer that honour and happiness may through life attend your Excellency, kind protectress Lady Frere, and the Members of your Excellency's respected family, and that your Excellency will, in your own home continue to remember us with some portion of that regard which sever cease to feel for your person.

His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere replied ;-

GENTLEMEN,—I thank you very heartily, on behalf of Lady Frere and myself, for the kind feeling expressed in your Address, and for the desire—to which Mr. Jansen has given effect with much artistic ability-that my likeness might remain among you when I am myself far away. And I fully enter into the feeling which has directed that this Portrait should be drawn, not in the guise wherein I have been used to live and work among you, but invested with the honours which the goodness of my Sovereign has bestowed upon :; for I feel that those honours mainly to Her Majesty's desire to intimate to all her subjects and servants, in this distant portion of her dominions, that honest and conscientious efforts to serve the British Crown by promoting the good government and happiness of her subjects, shall not go unnoticed m unrowarded. In now taking leave of this Province, where many years of my life have been spent since I first entered Poons thirty-two years ago, nothing could give me more heartfelt pleasure than the feeling that my labours as a public servant have been viewed by you in the terms expressed in such a gratifying manner in your Address. I say with truth that some of the years I have spent among you have been the happiest of my life, and it is one of extreme satisfaction to to feel convinced that the country and the class to which you belong have been, and are, advancing in prosperity, in wealth, and in intelligence. Nothing can be more unlike the Deccan of my early days than what I see now. The features of nature indeed ___ _ the same, but agriculture, commerce, and education have marvellously increased and in place of a population steeped in poverty, and dwelling the memory of the prosperous days of their forefathers. I see everywhere thriving people, marvellously improved, not only in wealth, but in contentment, loyalty and independence. Not less striking has been the change in your own class—the Sirdars of the Deccan. Circumstances made personally early acquainted with an unusual ber of your body, and I well remember the almost hopeless feeling with which I marked the discontent, the want of education, the general indebtedness, the estentation, and the want of any true appreciation of their position and duties, which made am almost despair of ever seeing the class of Sirdars of the Deccan preserved as a necessary and useful part of the community. I would not now speak thus of the Sirdars of former days, did I not feel that in all these respects there has been a change for the better, the tent of which few probably can appreciate but those who, like myself, have back among you after long intervals of absence. I would not flatter you by saying anything to induce a belief that the good work has been more than begun; but I do feel justified in stating my conviction that the tide has turned, and that there is every prospect of the Sirdars of the Deccan taking their natural place the leaders of the people in the work of civil improvement. as they used in old times to be in ____ You have __ immenso advantage over the upper classes in many other parts of India, in that you belong to the same race on the mass of your people, and that no impassable barrier separates you from the great body of those whom you rule and influence. You have a national history, and national well afamily traditions of succent achievements: you have a copious and flexible lauguage, spoken alike by prince and peasant, and capable of any amount of improvement to adapt it to the wants of a civilized people. You have, I feel assured, a great future before you as me of the leading races of British India; nothing but your own neglect interfere with your fulfilling the noble destiny before you. I feel assured that there many of you fully alive to these considerations. There may be old mon here present who recollect, as I do, how rare in former days were the merest rudiments of education among the Sirdars. I recollect but two who could converse in English, and very few had any distinct conception of the geography of their own country me the history of their fathors' time. How different it is now you all know; and it is me in these days to meet a young Chief whose friends do not intend him to be educated, m it used to be to find any who knew more than the merest rudiments of learning. But, m you all know, the actual performance of a young Chief rarely comes up to the wishes of his ministers; and the _____ of this, as you also well know, is the almost entire absence of any education among the mothers and wives of the Sirdars' class. There are, I know, honourable exceptions, which are yearly becoming ____ numerous; but. = a body, you = well aware that the ladies of Sirdars == secluded, not according to your ancient Hindu usage, but according to a comparatively modern fashion, derived from the Mahomedans; and there is hardly a Sirdar's mother or wife, who can do than read write, and but few who can even do that. A poor man's poverty may often force him to learn, and to improve himself; but the son of a great - rich has little chance of learning, if his mother be ignorant un insensible to the value of education; and this is the reason why I would urge on you most strongly, the education of your wives and daughters, not only for the same reasons which apply to all female education, but as a matter of paramount importance to your order. There are many among you sufficiently well-informed to press forcibly on your enlightened brothren a truth naturally distasteful to am unlettered military aristocracy. You can tell them how, among the nations which now bear rule in every part of the earth, there is mainstance of a class of nobles retaining its position without being superior in intelligence and education to the mass of the people; nor any instance of an educated nobility the ladies of which were allowed to remain uncducated. Few who have not been in Europe or America can estimate the influence which educated women possess in those continents. But you - all more - less aware of the great influence which many noble ladies besides Her Majesty the Queen, possess in England; and by these and many examples, you may satisfy your untravelled unlettered fellow Sirdars that they need not fear the influence of ladies educated . the wives and mothers of our statesmen and soldiers. Few things gave megreatpleasure during my late tour in the Southern Maratha Country than to hear of the general good management of the estates of most of the native Chiefs, and among other improvements, of the introduction into many of them of the Revenue Survey and Assessment, which, by fixing limits to the Government assessment, affords the best security for agricultural industry. I noticed the contentment of the ryots, and heard of the good administration of police and justice, and the extension of roads and schools, of municipal water supply and the other improvements in jagheer villages, with the greater satisfaction, because I felt that they are the best security for the permanence of your order; for I need not remind you that m superior m privileged class of landed proprietors min long exist, if the great body of the people mu their estates are less happy and prosperous than those in Government villages. I feel deeply what you say of my services under whose onght to be dear to prince and peasant in India.—the late ismouted Earl Canning. It will be a grade to go to have laboured, however humbly, to advance the great aims he had in view; but it is from affectation that I feel that you have estimated my services in that, as in every part of my carrer, more highly than they deserve: for I feel most profoundly convinced of the great truth that the progress and welfare of India do not depend we this or that individual, we even on this or that institution measure, but generally on the connection of this country with England. It is not our surveys, our codes, or courts of justice; not our railways, our steam-engines, or more our armies : not our teachers or statesmen; but all these combined that under God's providence have helped to advance India. If we labour successfully, it is because we labour according to the sottled purpose of the British nation. What that purpose is you may gather, not from this act or measure, nor from the conduct of this or that individual. but from the general tenor of the acts of the British Government since the Deccan came into its hands. This is nearly the anniversary of the day when, eight years ago, you heard that purpose briefly, but formally, stated in the Queen's Proclamation. That proclamation declared the complete incorporation of British India with the British Empire, and I trust when you look back on what has since passed, you will feel with me that Her Majesty's Government have done their best in the interval to redeem the promises as made. will give you but two instances which are freshly before you. assist in the making of laws for his own people is and of the highest privileges which any subject can enjoy, and to this privilege the Natives of India have been freely admitted. To confer social rank is one of the honours which sovereigns only bestow, and to this your countrymen mow admitted on equal terms with the Queen's hereditary British subjects. There is no position of dignity memolument here in any part of the British empire to which an Indian subject of Her Majesty may not aspire, - which, if qualified and worthy, he may not hope to fill. I beseech you to prove yourselves worthy of this great destiny. I have spoken to you the plain truth, becomes real friend who may have an opportunity of speaking to you again; but wherever the rest of my life may be spent, I shall never cease to feel the warmest interest in the Deccan and its inhabitants, and to pray God that every happiness and prosperity may attend them all; and these feelings are, I assure you, shared by Lady Frere and the other members of my family.

In addition to this, the following occurs in the Administration Report of the Bembay Presidency for 1867-68:—

[&]quot;As a mark of respect for the late in of the Government, in H. In Frere, the Chiefs voluntarily raised by subscription a sum of Es 40,000 for the purpose of founding twenty scholarships in the Belgaum Sirdans' High School, to in styled, The Frere Scholarships.

On the 4th February 1867, the following Address and presented to His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., by the Native Community of Poons.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,—The honour has been conferred upon me, by the Native Community of Poons, to present in their name the accompanying Address to your Excellency. The present being almost the last occasion of Your Excellency's appearance in public, certainly the last of your appearing among the native public of Poons, the pleasure feel seeing you again in midst is greatly lessened by the presence of the feeling that shall have that pleasure no more. It becomes us, then, this time to beg of your Excellency to allow us to bid you respectful and solemn Farewell. We cannot help feeling, that in losing your Excellency, so lose not only wise and beneficent Governor, but also true and faithful Friend. And we have endeavoured to represent in some to your Excellency, in the Address which I have the honour of presenting, the feelings uppermost in our minds this time, when the direct and

Speaking for myself individually it is a matter of no little gratification to me to be selected to present the Address to your Excellency. For me it has a peculiar pleasure, as it enables me to express here the debt of gratitude I owe to your Excellency for the interest you so kindly evinced always in the welfare of my family, which I shall ever gratefully remember.

With your Excellency's permission, I will now, on behalf of the Native Inhabitants of Poons, read the Address drawn up for presentation to your Excellency, craving for it your Excellency's gracious acceptance.

To His Excellency Sir Henry Bartle Edward Frens, G.C.S.I, K.C.B., Governor of Bombay.

Your Excellency,—We, the undersigned Native Inhabitants of Poona, beg respectfully to approach your Excellency on the eve of your departure from amongst us, not merely to express a formal Farewell, but to convey to your Excellency notion of the debt of gratitude which we feel ourselves to for the many proofs have received, both public and private, the presentation of Sold Medal, which honors have marranged by Government, descended to his Khan Bahadur Padamji Pestanji;—and the grant of which approved of in the following by C. Wood, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India:—

"The zeal with which Mr. Pestanji Sorabji and his was Mr. Padamji Postanji appear to have discharged their duties to the State, and their loyalty to the British Government during a lengthened period of service, and ospecially the fidelity with which they fulfilled their engagements during the late disturbinance, appear to me to be very suitably acknowledged in the permission to assume the Honorary Title of "Khan Bahadur," and in the presentation of a Medal."

On this occasion their Friends in Poons, Bombay, Abmednaggar, Jaulna, Nowsari, sent congratulatory addresses, and raised a Testimonial Fund which, with their own large donation and invested for the support of a charitable Dispensary, designated the "Ehan Bahadur Pestanji Sorabji's Poons Charitable Dispensary."

Khan Bahadur Pestanji Sorabji died in 1861, at the son of 71. Son, Khan Bahadur Padamji Pestanji, besides son abovementioned honors conferred by Government, is a Fellow of the University of Bombay, a Municipal Commissioner for the City of Poona, and a Member of the Local Funds Committee. He also enjoys the important privilege conferred by Section: 22 of Act VIII 1859, which grants exemption to the selected few from appearing person in a Court of Law.

of your Excellency's regard for the Natives of this country, and your sincere wishes for their advancement and general welfare.

Thirty-three years ago your Excellency entered upon the honorable, though arduous, to this Presidency; and from that time to the present you have constantly manifested a desire to become acquainted, as far as possible, with the languages, the manners, the customs, the religious, and even the prejudices of the people among whom you added to labour; and obtaining a rare and extensive knowledge upon these and kindred subjects, your Excellency has been enabled to govern us with an intelligence which it needed only your singleness of purpose, and resolution to do what included in the produce practical results of the greatest value and most extensive application.

By consistently and continuously befriending and encouraging Native Education, your Excellency has applied a lever, which must ere long, as and power can be brought to bear on it, have the effect of raising the bulk of the people of this great country, into position where the light of real knowledge, of truth, and of progress, may shine upon them. The great results, already obtained, are a sign not be mistoken, of the still greater results which be. And here we must not omit to mention, that we owe your Excellency thanks for the great interest you took in, and the encouragement you gave to, the advancement of the study of Oriental Literature.

Upon the important work of Female Education in this Presidency your Excellency has bestowed special attention, and it must be a subject of sincere pleasure and gratification to your Excellency (it is to it) that this great movement, with which the highest and best interests of the community are inseparably connected, has made, and is making, steady progress, not only throughout this Presidency, but generally throughout India. It will not soon be forgotten that your Excellency has been pleased, on numerous occasions, it give up much of your valuable time in attending the examinations of Girls' Schoole, in addressing words of encouragement in the purils and supporters of these institutions, and in impressing upon all,—both by word and example,—the importance of the movement, and the importance of persevering in it.

And here, your Excellency will pardon us, if we ask permission to tender our most sincere thanks to Ledy Frere, for the part she has taken in this, perhaps the most important of all the means now in operation for the regeneration of India. There we yet another way in which your Excellency encouraged Education, and for which best thanks are due. Your Excellency has appointed Natives of India to posts of high honour under your government to Judgeships of the High Court, to Assistant Judgeships, to Judgeships of Small Cause Court, be Settlement Officers, Revenue Officers, Magistrates, Assistant Superintendents of Police, &c., and has hereby declared, in the palpable manner, that if natives qualified for such and similar posts, their claims for employment will receive full and ample consideration,—in the spirit of the to this effect given in the Proclamation of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, which in this, in other points you have endeavoured faithfully and consistently carry out.

But not only in the matter of Education has your Excellency atriven improve condition of the people of India. You have fostered the establishment of works of public utility, and have encouraged the eraction and endowment of many institutions, hospitals, and asylums, for the alleviation of the distresses of the suffering and the poor. Under your auspices the principle of Municipal government, acted upon from remote antiquity in this land, but which had from various circumstances fallen long since into very general disuse, has been re-introduced into several of the towns of residency. In short, wherever and whenever an opportunity has presented itself to your Excellency for the doing of any act, whereby the condition of the natives of this country could be amelicrated or improved, your Excellency has never hesitated to embrace the opportunity, and to turn it the best account.

The Inhabitants of Poona have especial reason to congratulate your Excellency, and themselves, — the establishment of the Deccan College, the Engineering College, the David Sassoon Hospital, and the Infirm Asylum, — proposed — Water Works, and various other works completed, — in progress, which owe their existence either to the action of your Excellency's government, — the munificence of private individuals encouraged and supported by your Excellency; and — mark our — of the special obligations under which your Excellency's kindness has placed us,—the Inhabitants of Poona,—we have set on foot — movement for the perpetuation of your Excellency's memory in this city, by the establishment of — scholarship in — Poona Civil Engineering College, in connection with your Excellency's name.*

It is with feelings of sorrow we contemplate prospect of the speedy termination of your Excellency's kind and beneficent rule, rule which has the effect of steadily increasing the attachment of Chiefs and people of this Presidency your Excellency personally, to the Gomes of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, which you have so faithfully and worthily administered. We are, nevertheless, cheered by reflection that in the position you cocupy Member of the Indian Council in England, you will continue to be connected with country; and are that you will always have its interests at heart, and will endeavour to further them to the utmost extent of your great powers.

It is our earnest prayer that the days of your retirement, after your years of assiduous labour, may be many, that your Excellency and Lady Frere with the members of your respected family may be blessed with health and happiness; that in appreciation of the great results of your Excellency's government here, our Most Gracious Sovereign may be pleased to continue to shower favours and honours upon you; and that when your race is completely run, you may receive from our common Father and God the rewards which all the followers of the various faiths, of this vast empire, believe to wait upon the good and the virtuous, and especially upon those who, being rulers, have, like your Excellency, exerted themselves steadily and perseveringly to forward the best interests of those committed their charge.

His Excellency Sir II. B. E. Frere replied:

Khan Bahadur Padamji Pestanji and Gentlemen,—I thank you kindly for your Address to me. When I me last amongst you I had not expected to be able to visit Poona again, but business of importance connected with the growth of this rapidly increasing station required my presence, and I me glad of the opportunity thus offered me of thanking you for this great proof of your good will. However flattering may be the views you have taken of what I have been able to accomplish, you have not, I may you, over-estimated the earnestness of my desire to be of real and permanent service to the community you represent, and among whom so large a portion of my official me been passed.

I am glad that you have given such prominence to the subject of education, for though many have been able to render more personal service and I have done in the sum of education, I you no one estimates more highly than I do its importance regards the advancement of the people of this country. rightly speak of education in its widest sense - ennobling and furnishing useful training of every kind which mimprove the intellect, the heart, or even the critical powers of man; and it is. bearing more - less upon every respect and variety of true education in its most comprehensive serse, that I attach a particular value to the view you express regarding female education and that I would beg to thank you in Lady Frere's well win my own, for what you say of our share in promoting it. I I once before reminded you, I can remember the first native lady in Bombay who could speak and read a little English, and I - recollect the time when your excellent friend, the late Mr. James Mitchell, opened the first school for teaching little girls in this city of Poons to read and write their own Marathi language. This school he allowed me to visit with many a careful charge that I would not say anything about it which could attract general attention to his attempt, lest suspicion and prejudice should be aroused and the good work be hindered. I remember the time being told in answer to my enquiry, from more than respectable Brahmin of my acquaintance, that a few Brahmin ladies of high rank could be found who could read and write, but that it me not a subject to be talked about, for that reading and writing man not generally considered such desirable accomplishments for women, that their possession by the ladies of any respectable family would be readily admitted in conversation with a casual acquaintance. How much your own public feeling has changed in that respect you all know. Female schools for all classes and most to be met with in Poons, and many of the upper classes have their girls taught in home. the present scarcity of famale teachers, the knowledge thus acquired is generally of necessity very elementary, but I feel assured much will soon be done to supply this want, and that the spread of education among the of Poons, and of Western India generally, will be quite - rapid and as important, in all useful results, mamong the ____ It ___ often been remarked it this be, in fact, but a return to ancient habits in which the olden times showed wisdom than their descendants unless all history misleads. As the ladies of sucient India, of Syrin. and Persia considered learning and literary accomplishments no unfeminine attributes, but rather as necessary marks of true nobility of rank and character, it is, we me assured, a comparatively modern innovation in India which would shut up the of any noble house - debar them mental culture; and the Hindus and Parsons who would educate the women of their families . as to fit them to come out and influence society, as do their sisters in the Western world, are more true to the sucient tradition of their race than those who would perpetuate the later innovation of female seclusion. In this respect I cannot but regard most important the change in the habits of the upper classes of native society here and in Bombay, which many may perhaps regard superficial and of little moment. Lady Frere and I both cherish a pleasing recollection of the first great entertainment given by any native gentleman on this side of India at which and of the guests accompanied the Governor and his wife. Sir George and Lady Arthur, and were presented to the wife of the host and to the other ladies of the family. Our host of that evening has since then been equally tried in the bighest prosperity and in much domestic affliction and adversity, and has been equally beloved and respected in every condition of life. She has taken active share in promoting and suggesting deeds of thoughtful, unselfish. and large-hearted benevolence which will, I am persuaded, preserve the names of herself, her husband, and children, not only in written history, but in popular tradition, as among the benefactors of their kind. But I have often thought that the innovation in social customs in which she took part so many years ago will not prove the smallest, we the least important among the good and wise deeds with which her memory will be associated. Others mow following the example then set, and have of late seen native ladies do the honours of their parents' and husbands' homes with grace and dignity which make us | lament the custom which has long debarred them from what to their natural influence in society. I was sure, gentlemen, and it is from no vague feeling that you prominently noticed this subject in your parting address, and is assuredly in no spirit of trifling that I dwell on it in replying to you, but from a deep and serious conviction of the extent to which this subject of female education affects our appreciation of Oriental habits and character. You will clearly and easily this influence among the simplest and roughest of our race than the more cultivated and polished; but from the peer in his palace to the peasant in his cottage you will find that Englishmen generally regard. = a being of slower order. that who treats his wife as a drudge was inferior, and they take for granted that he who confesses to feel me true respect for his own wife we be worthy of but little respect himself. On the other hand, whatever his prejudices the average Englishman is instantly struck with a feeling of real sympathy for any whom he discovers to possess the same feelings in his domestic relations which actuate himself with a belief that of the many fruitful of prejudice which have prevented the East and the West from understanding each other, few bave been more potent than those customs which led Europeans to imagine that you do not regard the fairest portion of creation with the same respect and admiration as do, and which thus make Europeans shy to confess to you how largely the civilising and humanising element of female influence guides and elevates - Western civilization. I have listened with peculiar pleasure to that part of your address which connects my name with the municipal improvements of Poons. In the monuments of private munificence and public spirit which we springing up around us, I can claim no share beyond what may belong to warm sympathy with their objects and a corresponding readiness to afford any aid which they might require from Government, but I shall ever take a deep interest in the municipal improvements of Poons. The extent of what has been already done may be underrated by those who do not, m I do, recollect Poons in the days when - wheel carriage could pass through the streets. and when the Governor Sir Robert Grant had to return the visits of the Sirdars on horseback. In any point of view, however, it is clear that Poons has far outgrown in present municipal organisation, and I me glad to believe there the materials available providing an enlarged and improved municipal organisation which shall do for Poona what is being done-on a far larger scale

Testimonial

Sir &. Bartle E. frere, G. C. S. I, K. C. B.

-000-

A Public meeting—which had been convened by the Sheriff Vinayakrao Vasudevaji Esquire, in the receipt of mumerously signed requisition— in held in the Town Hall, for the purpose of taking steps with miview to honouring His Excellency Sir Henry Bartle Frere on the occasion of his departure from Bombay.

THE HONOURABLE A. J. HUNTER, in taking the chair, said :-

GENTLEMEN. -- I thank you most cordially for the honour you have done me in calling me to preside at important and influential meeting. I cannot, however, refrain from expressing my regret that I me so ill-adapted for occupying the position, and I trust you will all believe that this I not intended - common form of apology on my part, but as an honest, heartfelt expression of my feeling of being unfitted for occupying so prominent a place. We are met together in connection with the approaching departure from this country of His Excellency Sir Bartle Frere, to consider the propriety of giving public expression to our feelings of respect for his personal, and admiration of his public character, and also to decide in what form it is most fitting to give expression to these feelings. On the first of these points I we there will be only one unanimous opinion, that it is most fitting and right that an should publicly acknowledge his eminent services—that it is not only fitting and right, but a duty we owe as much to society and the public interests of this country . Sir Burtle Frere, that before bidding him farewell, should publicly mark and sense of the good he has done the country, in different capacities of a public servant, a statesman, and a ruler, by voting him - address expressive of sentiments of respect and admiration for his person and character and such other memorial = this meeting may seem best. Gentlemen, it if for you decide what form that memorial shall take. I am sure that all actuated by the same earnest desire to do that which is most likely to be | the time pleasing to Excellency and gratifying to the people of Bombay, and any one of will be willing to sink a emopinions in matter, if they me found to be wariance with the general voice. Gentlemen, may well and truthfully be me His Excellency has already perpetuated his name by his deeds, it has been written on the immortal of history-and that in erecting statue in his honour otherwise handing down - posterity some token commemorative of his rule, only giving a mere local character to the memorial, while his name and his deeds occupy an important place in the annals of the country. But it it that his name will in any way become more familiar in consequence of there being such a memorial of him-it is not that it requires such a morial save it from being forgotten-but because it is due to ourselves and the public interests of the country that services such m his, should be specially in fittingly recognised, and any such recognition must of sity be of a local character. Gentlemen, there we in this hall, and in and around this building, statues of many of this country's great men, the Marquis of Cornwallis, the Marquis of Wellesley, Mountstuart Elphinstone, Sir John Malcolm, Lord Elphinstone and others, of whom it may justly be said that their statues have done nothing merpetuate their names, me these almost better known in England than they are in this country. Their names and their deeds are the property and the pride of the Empire-it only these pieces of well-cut stone which must the property of the Municipality of Bombay. The monuments of the men are their deeds-the merely tokens of affectionate remembrance on the part of the people of Bombay. And, gentlemen, any we may erect in honour of Sir Bartle Frere will in the way only serve as a token of the grateful appreciation in which he is held by this people. His many rests on higher grounds—the services he has rendered to the country; but it is well that me should so evince and affection, and that a memorial of him should take its place beside statues of the great of former times, to show to the generations come that we able to appreciate and understand such services as those which His Excellency has rendered to the country. It would would of place for into any details of his public career, in this within the province of those gentlemen who will address you in reference to the different propositions that will be brought forward; but before making way for them I may be permitted to say that I is not only in I public and official capacity that Excellency has deserved well of this country. He honoured and esteemed as a statesman, and as a eminently nainstaking, conscientions, firm, and unflinching ruler, than as the possessof most and warm sympathies, as courteous and all all who have occasion - communicate - him, and ever ready and anxious only I further the general advancement of the country, but to secure

■ high tone to the moral and intellectual character of society generally. While it is his public character, his ability, decision, honesty of purpose that has made his word great we a statesman and ruler, it is his excellence as a member, and as the head of society in this place, that has carned for him the esteem and affection of this community.

THE HONOURUBLE LYTTELTON HOLYOURE BUYESS, ADVOCATE GENERAL, in proposing the first resolution, spoke an follows:—

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,-It is with peculiar pleasure, but with the utmost diffidence and distrust as to my power to do justice to the theme, that at the request of the Committee I rise to propose for your adoption a resolution by which we intend to testify to the worth of the public services of our departing Governor. This, Sir, is not the time - which to enter into any lengthened address, but I must ask your kind attention during a few minutes while I pass in review that brilliant career which to the regret of all in Bombay, and especially to ourselves, is - shortly to terminate in the course of a few days. Mr. Frere was appointed in 1833, and he arrived about September in the following year. In 1835 he received his first appointment at Poons. In 1837 he was appointed under the Revenue Commissioner of the Northern Koncan, and he had the opportunity of seeing the early portion of that great work, the Revenue Survey and Settlement, carried out under one of the distinguished persons who had originated it, I mean Mr. Ramsay. In 1842, on the arrival of Sir George Arthur - Governor of Bombay, Mr. Frere was selected ... Private Secretary. The school which that was, was an admirable one for enabling him to see the inner working of the various departments of Government, and there is no doubt that he took every advantage of the opportunities which were thus brought before him. But in reviewing his public career, I cannot refrain from making one passing allusion to that happy attachment which, I believe, sprang up beneath the walls of Parell, that happy attachment which ripened into a still happier alliance which, whatever blessings it may have brought, and blessings they unquestionably have been without number to Mr. Frere during the whole of his married life, has given such inestimable, benefits to the society of this Presidency since the happy day when the kind, the courteous, the hospitable, the aympathising, the aocial-hearted Lady Frere first stepped under the lofty portals of Parell as the wife of His Excellency the Governor. Mr. Frere remained in the position of Private Secretary until 1845. In that year he took his fuclough to England and he remained there for about a couple of years, when, after his return to this country, he was appointed by the Governor, Sir George Clerk, to the responsible

^{*} Sir George Clerk's Minute was to the following effect:-

Residency of Sattara should be in the hands of able civilian. Incalculable good might be done there by a discreet and real cus man, competent to advise and instruct the Rajah and matters of civil administration, and state economy. * * * conduct this work we require an officer of judgment, ability, and seal, and who has devoted attention to, and had experience in questions regarding the revenue and judicial as well segment administration of States. The person whom I have selected for the duties, and who is, I believe, excellently qualified to discharge them Mr. B. Frere. I propose therefore suppoint him Resident at Sattara."

found himself responsible for the Government of an immense territory, of a territory with inhabitants numbering upwards of hix millions, a territory which was in point of size considerably larger than England and Wales. I need do nothing more than allude to the irrigation works, to the works connected with the harbour of Karachi, and the other works which to here to mention, which were not merely planned, but which carried out under the active co-operation of Mr. Frere. Indeed, Sir, I have not heard any one either deny or surgest my doubt as to the perfect success, the extreme brilliancy of Mr. Frere's administration of Sind. Sir, in 1856,

" Viscount Falkland's Minute on the subject was m follows;-

"It is at all times easier to analyse, as my Hen'ble Colleagues (Mesers J. P. Willoughby and D. A. Blane,) have done on the preaent occasion, the qualifications of any individual who may be selected to fill an important post, thank to determine justly between the comparative pretensions in the various parties who may not be deemed ineligible for, in be considered entitled to aspire to it. This duty devolves in it have endeavoured most earnestly to perform it scrupulously in the case of Mr. Frere, and others whose claims in the distinction of being sent to implicable supposed equally strong with his.

Put the Commissionership in Sind requires munion and Islance of qualifications which in my opinion are not possessed in a like degree by any Member of the Civil Service senior to that gentleman, who is a civilian efficient year's standing | and whose firmness of purpose, mild disposition, and conciliatory manners, cannot but insure for him in the exercise of his official functions the read; co-operation and respect of the military authorities, in a greater degree than any semicrity could productive of such desirable results." when he had resided in Sind for about six years, he went to England on his medical furlough. The Persian War broke out and induced Mr. Frere to return earlier than he had anticipated. He arrived in Bembay in the latter portion of 1857, and he had barely reached karachi in the following month of May to resume his office as ruler of the principality, when he received intelligence of the outbreak of Mecrut and the march of the revolting seroys upon Delhi: in fact, that the whole of India was in a flance. Sir, I feel it quite unnecessary to dilate upon the eminent services which were rendered by Mr. Frere in the course of that fearful crisis. With his thorough knowledge of the native character, a knowledge acquired especially in Sind during the six years of his previous bappy reign, he trusted the people of Sind and the people trusted him. You know that acting upon his own responsibility and I believe without consulting the Government of Bombay he despatched troops in the first instance to Sir John Lawrence in the Panjaub and afterwards when revolt broke out in the Bonday Presidency, and especially at Kolnmor, he almost denuded himself of European troops and despatched towards the south all the available European troops under his command. retaining only a mere handful and one regiment of, I think, the 3rd Bombay Light Infantry. Then when dissatisfaction appeared among two of the mative infantry regiments which were stationed at karachi, the revolt was immediately suppressed with a firm and decisive hand, and the mutineers were at once punished. This bold and energetic conduct of Mr. Frere was patent to the eye of every intelligent observer, and I need scarcely remind you that after his great public services during the mutimes, he received, in February 1858, the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. Lord Panniure in moving the vote in the House of Lords, and in mentioning pointedly the services of Mr. Frere, says: "It is certain that there is no man to whom India awes g deeper debt of gratitude." In the following year, I think in April 1859, Lord Derby made a further explanation of the services of Mr. Frere m the occasion of the second vote of thanks, and about the same time Mr. Frere received the well-merited distinction of the Civil Knighthood of the Companicuship of the Bath. In October 1859, Sir Charles Wood, the Secretary of State for India, nominated Sir Bartle Frere to a place in the Council of the Governor General. Sir Bartle proceeded to Calcutta to perform his ardnows duties there, and he obtained for the first time a knowledge of practical working of the whole machinery of that vast body, the Government of India. He became, must of you are aware, the intimate and trusted friend of the late Lord Canning, and after His Lordship's return to his native country, he became the equally trusted adviser of his Lord Elgin. We now approach the time in which he became more immediately connected with our Presidency, and it was in March 1862 that Her Majesty the Queen, acting doubtless on the advice of the Secretary of State and the other ministers, appointed Sir Bartle Frere to the Government of the Presidency. He arrived here as many of us recollect towards the close of the following month of April, and his qualifications on taking up Government here were perfectly unrivalled. His knowledge of the native language, the knowledge which he had acquired of the native habits of the inner life of the roots of the Marstla districts, the knowledge acquired by him during the time he filled subordimate offices in the Mofussil, the knowledge acquired by him during the whole of his administration in the departments of the Bombay Government during the three years he was Private Secretary to Sir. George Arthur, added also to his knowledge of the actual administration acquired first as Resident and afterwards as Commissioner in Sattara, a knowledge which became increased and of a much more varied aspect, when he became the Ruler of the fine and rising province of Sind-these afforded him an experience which I apprehend maprevious Governor of Bombay ever had. On his arrival, Sir Bartle Frere returned to this Presidency with a reputation second to no Indian state-man of his time, and I ask you whether these five years' administration of the affairs of this Presidency has not thoroughly instified and maintained it? I leave to others who may follow me the pleasing task of dwelling in detail apon the unprecedented progress in education, in public works in this Presidency during the last five years, his encouragement of the university and of schools both in Bombay and in Poona and elsewhere. I however cannot forbear to notice what may be called the gift of the Municipal Act, and the invitation thereby given to the citizens of Bombay to discuss the municipal affairs connected with their own city with perfect freedom and honesty. You will appreciate, and especially natives here present will appreciate, his due recognition of the right of notives of this country to take part in the legislative and judicial functions of the State, and I will ask you whether a finger can be raised up and pointed against one single nomination by Sir Bartle Frere of any of the natives, not only of this city but also of the Deccan and Sind, to such high and responsible positions. I cannot fail to notice, as connected with his public services, his constant desire and his endeavour to see everything with his own eyes; and his progress through different parts of the Presidency, his various interriews, in which his knowledge of the language and character was of the utmost importance, with the Princes, Chiefs, and Sirdars of the country, and his Durbars were events of the highest political value. And I call upon you all to keep in mind his courtly and chivalrous bearing, his firmness, his decision, and his tenacity of will, and in fact the possession of all those qualiwriter to say, will in my limit judgment way with perfect correctness, that Sir Frere belongs to a sum of nigh extinct in modern days. Shall an inhabitants of Poons, ave and Sind, be allowed to offer their respectful homage to Sir Bartle Frere ... approaching departure; and the citizens of Bombay, where has resided leng, abstain from offering him a similar testimonial! I apprehend not. Let us do all we legitimately can; let give honour whom bonour I unquestionably due, for I believe from the time of George Oxenden, who was Governor of Bombay as far back as down of George Clerk, and most excellent and most excellent and ruler, between whom are have the names of Jonathan Duncan and Mount-Elphinstone, who looks down upon a portraved by a classic chisel of Chauntrey, of Sir John Malcolm, of Sir Robert Grant, and of Lord Liphinstone, who also faces us as delineated by the sculptor Foley. I apprehend that no Governor of Bombay in that long list has performed the high duties which have been cast upon him with such entire astisfaction has Sir Bartle Frere; and I apprehend that no man has exercised fuithfully the duties entrusted to him-those high and sacred duties entrusted to by his God and by his Queen,—and I call upon you therefore receive and to carry the resolution which has been placed in my hands, viz .- "That the public services of Sir Bartle Frere during his career in India deserve the grateful recognition and commemoration of people of Bombay."

* The Honourable T. J. Hovell-Thurkov, Private Secretary to the late Governor General, Eurl Bigin, and Author of "The Company and the Crown." At page of the work, Mr. Thurkov thus writes;—

In 1861, ill-health a second time compelled Sir George Clerk's resignation, and then it was a Charles Wood made perhaps his happiest appointment. To little the interpretation of the charles where the charles we chare a nown to all in India as a pattern of vision intelliger t refinement. A civilian is Bombay extraction, whose little intelliger t refinement. A civilian is Bombay extraction, whose little can enlarged by experience in Bengal, be had become Lord Eigin's senior Councilior. Throughout the trying t men of the land displayed a courage only by his moderity, and tempered by his chivalry to natives.

Henry Bartla Edward Frere belenged to a facility welling modern days. To courtly bearing, and all that fascinates a facility thought clathed in simplest language that failed bring conviction. In beneath and silky and style, there lurked a tenacity will which natives to learn by intuition. Arriving at his post, he found a practiced Council, well compared, the wellanguage with menagement, was miculea."

SIR JAMESTI JEIRERHOY, in seconding the resolution said : Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen-It is with peculiar pleasure that I - second the. which has been proposed. I have bonear if a minterrupted friendship was excellent departing Governor for many years. ever since the very day on which he first landed in this country. | have been, therefore, a spectator of his career—and not an uninterested one—from very commencement the present time. That career, it is apparent to world. been both brilliant and successful, and in a singular striking with general progress, and more especially with of poor, and the classes who mot unfrequently overlooked. But, Mr. Chairman, a is and my intention to take up the time and weary attention of the meeting by attempting to enlarge upon topics of general policy of government, topics were or less patent to all, and which have received, and me receiving, appropriate treatment from gentlemen far competent and the treat of them than I was be; but I do was it was be deemed out of place if I make a few remarks upon certain characteristic traits of the Governor we me about to love, being such me I can beer personal testimony to- Perhaps no one has had great proofs than myself of Excellency's kindness of beart, his conciliating manners, his unwillingness to offend the prejudices of the people among whom he lived, his perfect uprightness, his strict impartiality, . firmness of purpose in all where principle involved, his carnestness and zeal in the discharge of what he felt to be his duty, as well as his utter freedom from anything like exclusiveness : qualities which have me for him the respectful affection of the people of this Presidency, and have gained for him the universal popularity which he enjoys in the present moment. Popularity resting upon bases such = these, does = fall to the lot of every Governor of a Presidency, but the possession of it cannot, I think, it to be to its posa of happiness of a very pure and exalted kind. It will be forgotten that the reform in municipal government, carried and under the auspices of Excellency, is really a return in the man ancient usages of the country in the respect; and people being eminently conservative -though not, as is commonly supposed, to change if they see it progress or improvement—have been thus gratified in a twofold way. first, by wery fact of ancient usage being restored; and, secondly, by the practical thus received that the British Government, represented by Excellency, desirons the natives of land enjoy privileges self-government, only such as few conquered have ever been allowed to enjoy, but also such as the people of many nominally independent have wished a sighed for in vain. It is for me to mail upon the encouragement given by His Excellency to the

trading interests of this port, in which, however, his anxiety has been that Bombay should reap the benefit of the excellent position and other advantages with which Nature has blessed her: upon the spread of education among the masses, which has been marked during the tenure of of retiring Governor, than in any former period of similar duration | upon the great improvement and extension, during the same interval. of the grand of intercommunication both by railway and telegraph; upon the development of the resources of the country, which has followed almost nuturally upon its being tapped by the great trunk lines. I can, however, revollect, and that not many years ago, when there was a want of almost all of these things, and of many things besides, although of late me have got m necustomed to them, that they have already become to me almost like tlong standing institutions. Most of the improvements above alluded to were indeed inaugurated previous to our Governor's coming amongst us; yet the part he has taken in beloing them forward to their present satisfactory and hopeful condition, has been a very important one; and on this account, as well as on account of the many virtues which have shone out conspicuously is character, throughout a long and splendid career, he deserves to be gratefully remembered in Bombay; and ■ is only fitting that the obligations of the community to him should be recorded and handed down in some visible and tangible manner, to we children and children's children, we that they may learn to honour him whom we of this generation have much cause to honour. I cannot help feeling that if my venerable father were this day alive, how gratified he would be witness, and take part in the present movement. He numbered among intimate friends Mr. Williamson Rameav, for some time Secretary to Government in the Revenue Department, and afterwards First Revenue Commissioner, the immediate superior of Mr. (now Sir) Bartle Frere. My father, therefore, and good deal of Mr. Frers, and what he saw he respected and loved. Well do I remember time, not long before his death, when, just after taking leave of Mr. Frere, retiring to his room, affected even to tears by the depth of his emotion, he said what now seems abnost to have been prophetic, "May God blass him: would that they may make him some day a Governor "! I beg, then, most heartly to second the proposition moved by the Renourable the Advocate General.

Hon'ble Mr. George Foggo, in moving the second resolution, said— Sir,—If I apprehend rightly the spirit of this assembly we have been been been day, Katives III Europeans, Soldiers and Civilians, Merchants III Traders, with all our heart and mind and strength, to render honour II Sir Bartle Frere. On any other occasion and under any other circumstances, upocially in will hall, where we have us often been somiring listeners we was eloquent interesting addresses, it might well be thought stronge in me tosay, will I rejoice that His Excellency I not amongst up to-day, but I III III because his presence must of necessity have interfered with that free and enthusiastic expression of admiration, esteem and regard, which we have Biready heard from you, Sir, and from the Hou'ble the Advocate General. and which I am confident an aball listen in from every speaker, who the privilege to-day of addressing this great assemblage. The resolution that has been entrusted to me is in the following terms:-- That the and energetic exertions of Sir Bartle Frere in originating and promoting important works of public improvement and usefulness deserve the thanks of the Inhabitants of this Presidency." To recapitulate the public works of importance Sir Bartle Frere has been concerned in throughout his career, would be recount a long chapter in the history of this Pres'-colleagues and friends who now share with him the toils of State, or some of those proconsuls and proprestors who remember, and who shared labours in Sind and in other districts of the Presidency, might have addressed you to-day, - award, as those who have served with him under him alone award it, the just and full measure of commendation is his due. Sufficient for me is it a say, for Poops and for Bombay. Monumentum si requires, circumspice. You knew Poons, thirty, twenty, nay ten years ago, look her now! You knew Bombay thirty, twenty, nay wears ago, look at her now! To dullest imagination I leave it to foretell the fair cities that five years hence will respond to those names But, Sir, while I leave it to others, whose knowledge is more precise, to deal out the exact measure of praise that ||| due ||| |||| Bartle Prere for promotion of public works, I gladly recognize the opportunity of holding up to admiration the statesmanlike forethought, the persistent and persevering energy, the generous sympathy, the self-denying co-operation, which he has displayed, not only recent times, but throughout his career, towards every project, no matter from whence | emanated, he judged could in any way tend - benefit of the country which he served. Whether me contemplate him in the early years of his official career, calmly and patiently laboring among a simple agricultural population, with enlightened zeal, seeking to improve and elevate their condition, and in the same time labouring to qualify himself for im important duties that might be and that have been, in the course of events, entrusted to him; or urging on the project of that brilliant soldier, Major John

Jacob, the enlargement of the Bigaree in Upper Sind, giving sterile soil, ensuring immunity from famine, and spreading comfort and plenty among the people; or, if we are down a limit career, his daily life among ourselves, and call to mind the enlightand ready sympathy which he, a civilian of the East India Company, manifested with independent commercial classes, rejoicing recognize mercantile element, whenever its manifestation was the good of ; or, again, his and fostering care of every effort, great small, for the spread of education, of every effort, in the eloquent words of the Vice-Chancellor of our University to create an intellectual vital soul among the people. As the poet expresses it, " the boy it is of the man ": the spirit that speaks I the Governor of the Presidency, is that thirty years before breathed through the young civilian in the Deccan. I have observed, Sir, that we we late occasion were Excelleney disclaimed, with characteristic modesty, any share in of private munificence and public spirit, which we see springing up around us, beyond what might belong warm sympathy with their oblects and a corresponding readiness to afford every aid they might require from Government. I venture to think, and I know the opinion is cordially widely shared by the native community, that it is just that sympathy which is so rare and - valuable, and the more valuable when accompanied as it often has been by a ready and delicate tact in guiding and directing proffered liberality. Thus has be been able to pluck allegiance from hearts, and to knit by firm ties, the feelings of high and low throughout India, to the British Crown. The career of Sir Bartle Frere, in this Presidency, may be ended. For India and for this Presidency as a part of India may it long be continued, Called a min the Indian Council in England, I trust, we may the eloquent and touching words of the address of Sirdars of the Decesn, that he may long be spared, foster, by advice, a beneficent and enlightened policy, and to promote, by great and varied knowledge, and by mexperience acquired in every part India, the happiness of its people. I rejoice that we manimous as to the propriety and fitness of erecting in this hall a statue honour. Though dead, he yet speaketh-dead indeed Bombay in person, but alive and work for her in another sphere, alive too, in form habit as dwelt amonget us, by the sculptur's magic art. I am not sure, but that some distant day, when passions and prejudices now rife. shall have mellowed by the sobering hand of time, some stranger, contemplating the statues of the herces and statesmen, who shall, in his measure, have helped to win and maintain the empire of India, and whose statues may then be ranged around this noble hall, will not exclaim,

He, in u general, honest thought,
And common good to all, makes of them.
His life was gentle; and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up And say to all the world, This was a was !"

MR. VINAYARRAO JAGANEATHJI SANEARSETT, in seconding the resolution, in :--

Sir.—I all that words of mine are needed to commend to you in resolution which has been a ably and effectively proposed by the honorable speaker who has preceded I I may say that there is nothing which harmonises better with the native mind than a statue. - means of commemorating the eminent services and virtues of those who have devoted themselves the welfare and advancement of this country. Now the testimony which I flowing in from all parts of India, and all that said and assented to evening, undoubtedly place Bartle Frere in the rank, only of a great statesman, but of a tried and stedfast friend of the chiefs and people of India. He may indeed said to mone of the few living types of those great and good men whom an all-wise Providence has the of this country, on introduction of rule amongst us-of the Elphinstones. Malcolms, and the Munros,-whose unfinished work in the settlement of the country he and his contemporaries took up and completed. It is fitting therefore that the statue of Sir Bartle Frere should take place side by side with those we see around us in this Hall, where our children and children's children may look up to it in grateful veneration for the great services has rendered to us. I feel that me permit Sir Bartle and Lady Frere to take their farewell of Western India without offering them some token of our admiration and regard, which they may be able to hand down to their family as a permanent testimonial from the Capital of Wester 1 India. It is with peculiar feelings I second the resolution which Hon'ble Mr. George Foggo has moved.

HON'RLD MANGALDAS NATHUDROT, in proposing the seed resolu-

Sir,—It is quite unnecessary for me after all is an assid by previous speakers,—and if feel is a should in incapable myself is doing justice to the subject, speaking as I do in a language foreign to me,—to review the coreer and administration of the great Indian statesman, honour whom citizens of Bombay have here to-day. But, however imperfectly I may acquit myself. I am constrained to testify to gratitude admiration with which the career of Sir Bartle Frere has inspired me and my countrymen; and I am encouraged w do m from the knowledge that I - to be supported by my learned friend the Rev. Dr. John Wilson, who is so admirably qualified to make up any deficiency on my part. Than Sir Burtle Frere, the natives of India have had more stedfast and valuable friend-none who has better understood their true interests and the means best calculated to promote their welfare and happiness. This has been in no way more signally displayed than by the increasing support he has given to the cause of liberal education, in obtaining large and increasing grants, for improving the efficiency of our Colleges, establishing High Schools all the principal towns in this Presidency, and for patronising native literature. Nor has Sir Bartle Frete been unmindful of the educational wants of the great body of the people in the interior; for to him is mainly due the credit of having successfully introduced a plan proposed many years ago by his early heind Sir George Wingate for raising local funds among the landholders and agricultural classes, and applying them towards opening village schools aided by funds. And it would ill become me if abstained in this place from alluding to the sympathy and encouragement - have received from Sir Bartle and Lady Frere in fostering native female education, which may now be said have fairly struck its roots in the soil under their watchful and benignant In his public capacity, acting on the golden maxim of the greatest good for the greatest number. Sir Bartle Frere has, regardless of the disapprobation of the more prejudiced of his countrymen, lost - opportunity wadvance us to places of trust, power, and honour, and thus stimulated us to greater efforts in educating and qualifying ourselves for still higher positions in the administration of the country. However unpopular one or two of Sir Bartle Frere's acts may have been to my countrymen. they will never forget that as Governor of Bombay he has set example of treating Natives = they have prepared themselves for it, equally with Europeans, which future Governors will find it difficult to emulate. Sir Bartle Frere - Governor of Bombay has permanently ruised the position of the Natives of India. That always strikes me as the greatest service he has done to m personally. As the service of Government seconded his public policy towards my countrymen with m whole weight of his social influence and position. In has made no distinction of race and creed in his social intercourse with us. He has received Natives with the same accessibility and courtesy as Europeans, and I is the uniform testimony of every one who has known Sir Bartle Frere, that III has been most accessible and courteous of any Governor of Bomboy-and obtained an immense influence us, which absence will only increase. It owing to this influence that the wealthy classes ____ forward, when wealth flowed into Bombay, with so much public spirit to establish and endow all grand of public institutions. We have not indeed realized our intentions and wishes, but still a great deal has been done, which would have been done if Sir Bartle Frere had been sincere and intelligent wellwisher of this country. Sir Bartle Frere has not only been the kindest, but by far the most large-minded, Governor - have ever had in Bombay; and I believe that, however great and good the future Governors of this Presidency may be, none will have a higher place in our regard and affectionate remembrance. With these remarks I box to propose the resolution entrusted me, and which is m follows:- "That Sir Bartle Frere is entitled to the special acknowledgments and gratitude of the Inhabitants of this Presidency for his enlightened application, eloquent and judicious advocacy, constant patronere and liberal support of education, philanthropy, and social improvein all their forms throughout the West of India."

THE REV. DR. JOHN WILSON Spoke as follows;-

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,-I very cordially second the motion which has just been made by the Hon'ble Mr. Manualdas. It would appear from the excellent review of the services of Sir Bartle Frere made by the Hon'lle Mr. Bayley that his appointments in the west of India, and indeed in the east of India, have been of a confidential and of a preferential character. And there was a reason for this in the position which Mr. Bartle Frere had even assumed when he was in England. By looking the lists of the Haileybury College it will be seen that when he left College he man the first in Classics, the first in Mathematics, the first in Law, and in first in Drawing, and that he would out to India as the first man of the first class. He brought with him to this Presidency many commendatory letters. I remember one which me put into my hands by him when he this island. It by a very remarkable person, who acquainted with many tribes and many tongues, and who had much of the vast face of this world,—the Rev. Dr. Joseph Wolf, who, I would mention, the first person who broke silence in this Hall in which I am now speaking. It is well known that he were very much addicted drawing inferences from what was presented his view; and he very excellent judge of human whatever he may have been we signs of the times. In the letter which I received from him-and was written at the request of the Right Honourable Frere of Malta-he prophesied that Mr. Bartle Frere would attain a distinction. have lived to see that he attained a distinction, and we are met to the that distinction. I believe that it all the services in which Sir Bartle Frere has been engaged he has left the impress of his own mind and of his benevolent heart. From his reply to the address presented to him on wery late occasion by the Sirdars and Native Gentlemen Poons, it would be observed that so early = 1835 he manifested a peculiar interest in female education, and that he went with my old and venerated friend Mr. James Mitchell to the camp of Poons, in the city, to me female school which he was attempting to form. I know of many other things of a like character which were done by Mr. Bartle Frere Poona, when he men there. I have heard him spoken of with the greatest fondness by II. E. Goldsmid, under whom he served when he me engaged with application of the Revenue Survey. The other day, during the Christmas Holidays, I went up the jungles of the Northern Koncan; and, of places, we should suppose that that would in the place where his was least known. I was told however, by the most degraded tribe of that partcalled the Warnlis-that two years ago will wisited them, and will be particularly kind the sone of one of the Chiefs whose acquaintance had made when he in the Northern Koncan. He had shown the members of the family the greatest kindness, and they spoke of him m of friend. His duties - Sattara - of very delicate character whole bearing and his whole frame of mind were fitted for the duties which he was there called to discharge first as Resident, and afterwards on lapse of the State, as Commissioner. I do not intend to refer to any poliaspects of the question which was raised with reference the extinction of the Sattara raj. Pratap Singh having been found guilty of being league with a foreign Government in India, his brother, Appa Sahib, was called to the throne, and when he died the State lapsed to the British Government. With great tenderness, with great respect, and with great consideration, the whole of the affairs of the royal family were settled under the advice of Sir Bartle Frere and the population of the country-which represented m being in the first instance somewhat corry at what had red-very soon formed a most loyal attachment to the British Government. It is consistent with my knowledge—and I have the proof in my pocket I chose wiring forward—that serious efforts made in in Sattara districts = get the sympathy of the agricultural population on == side of those who is risen against interests and against of humanity in the East of India. But from the attachment of the cultivators of the Setters districts these efforts were altogether in vain.

who tried to stir them up were informed that they had great _______br the wisdom of Britain and in her military and civil resources, and that the they received had far transcended expectations. In short they manifested to British Government with respect be everything of unpleasant character avoided. During the time that Mr. Frere was a he discharged merely the duties which incumbent upon him in connection with administration of province, but paid particular attention also state of whole population of the Sattara province. I have lately occasion to examine many statistical papers treating of various tribes and of this country, and I have not found with fuller and more precise information than that which was furnished in reply to the enquiries of Sir Bartle Frere when the same taken in the districts which I have just named. Sir Bartle Frere, too, looked to past ages as well as to me present, and he the Englishman who brought to notice the very extensive mains of the Buddhists in the territory of Karar. He also took agreet interest in a library which was found in the possession of Mahomedans at Beejapoor and which came into British possession. He got the books collected together and took steps | have them catalogued; and he moved the Bombay Government to their right disposal. It is not right for to make any remarks upon his administration in Sind, but there one connected with the dangerous position of that province and connected with military defences which I would take the liberty to mention. It is, in the 21st Regiment there was a majority of persons belonging the Upper Provinces of Hindustan. I believe that amongst eight hundred men there were 594 who belonged to Upper Hindustan, in which the muting originated; and who may therefore be supposed in have sympathised with their brethren who man in revolt. Keeping this fact in mind me better to appreciate, the character of the administration of Sind during that critical period. In that province also, Sir Bartle pursued the man enquiries the tribes and tongues that he had done elsewhere. In the collection of records of Bombay Government connected with there short paper by him in which he points out the magnitude of the province and shows that we as many square miles as the twelve old collectorates we were Bombay Presidency. It is true that the population is sparse, there being only of of line in Sind. They of a diversified character however, and the affection of all of them was gained by Sir Bartle Frere. The position, too, which he occupied in Sind, with regard to the movements of philanthropy and particularly referred to in this motion, was of a remarkable character. I shall not say saything as to the part taken by Sir Bartle ... Colcutta, further than to mention that it is consistent with my knowledge that. ____ during ___ distressing time of his residence ___ city. made himself acquainted with the philanthropical, and educational, and the religious operations which being carried on in Bengal Presidency. He gave them there his countenance encouragement. he was wont to do in connection with similar movements in this Presidency. Now, with regard to this Presidency. And referring the terms of this motion, it will be observed that Sir Burtle Frere has done a great deal for the promotion of education in connection with all its interests. We know what wise and affectionate counsels he gave to the Sirdars on several occasions. For many hundred years m native rulers of India,-by the popular feeling, and by the instructions which they received from that portion of the Arian tribe which mployed in the administration of their affairs, -- have been almost encouraged to remain in a state of ignorance. It was different in more ancient times in connection with India. I am one of those who believe that the origin of what is called Indian philosophy is due to the ancient Rajaha of India,-the Kehatriyas. We who me from the favoured lands of West, and who know the civilising and humanising power exercised by the upper classes of society on the middle and on the lower classes, greatly desire that the native rulers and chiefs of India should make sneedy and satisfactory progress in knowledge and in culture and the addresses of Bartle Frere have had, in an eminent degree, the tendency to encourage them to begin and to prosecute, their studies. And I have been most hanny to observe amongst a considerable number of them-some of them being in this assembly—a determination to follow the valuable advice he has given them. Then, again, to refer to the subject of female education, all know me peculiar interest which Sir Bartle has taken in this matter, and while expressing his congratulations on the progress made in female schools under the tuition of Brahmins and other male teachers, he has always urged me great importance of having female instructors and of having the same tender influence applied in the matter of education that to meffective in Europe. It is said by great French writer that the of civilization is the treatment of the female sex; and there is no doubt good treatment and respect towards the female is a correct index of civilization. I = therefore most thankful—having myself for many years laboured promote the work of female as well as male education in this Presidency-to that a good impression has been made upon many of the natives of this Presidency in the direction I have mentioned by the action and influence of Sir Bartle Frere and of his excellent lady.

Lady Frere. With regard to the higher education of the Presidency too, all know what Sir Bartle has done. I shall not recapitulate what this place by the Vice-Chancellor of the University ... occasion our last Convocation; I would call upon you however, to bear in mind while it of very great importance that education should in diffused amongst masses of India, in order that they may be prepared to come into possession of all the privileges which the highly favoured of Christendom enjoy, is nevertheless of great consequence that should be such a cultivation of the minds of select number would make a power, and a power effectually felt, throughout a country. And I think it is by ___ Universities and the studies which they direct ____ encourage—in connection with which so fervent hopes of usefulness entertained—that the end I have just indicated is to be reached. With regard to the education of the masses, too, I think that the masses which has been consummated, or at least put into practical form, under the Government of Sir Bartle Frere, is calculated to be productive of most happy consequences. I refer the matter of grants-in-aid. There may be persons here who do not appreciate the importance of this measure, but I believe that the time will come when under the stimulating influence of the system of grants-in-aid we shall see thousands educated where there are only hundreds, and the sources of knowledge opened up to multitudes of the people of this country. Sir Bartle Frere always an advocate of that system, and even while discussions and arrangements in connection with it were pending we had always the fullest confidence that the sympathy he expressed was a real sympathy. Now, in reference the question of general philanthropy, I would make this remark, that do not know of any public institution connected with the cause of philanthropy in Bombay which has not received the sympathy and support of Sir Bartle Frere. He has attended many meetings and many examinations in confection with philanthropical and educational objects, and I have thought that the demands made upon his time in this unreasonable. He complied almost uniformly, however, with such invitations, and both by his words will by his presence encouraged multiof an natives of country and of those who have come to sojourn 🚃 🛮 from England. I cannot conclude without 🔤 observation, 🐃 Sir Bartle Frere has paid particular attention to the circumstances of the many Europeans brought to this country in connection with the army, in connection with the naval services, and particularly in connection with the railways. ... been most that the European character be to degrade in India, and that peculiar appliances should be resorted to, to preserve Europeans in the pursuit of that which is good and to encourage them to proceed in the ways of righteousness, that they may be an example the multitudes around them. I have had a personal knowledge, and I may say the friendship of Governors Bombay from Sir John Malcolm to the present time and going backwards, and looking to Mr. Monastnart Elphinstone well as to from the time of Sir John who have ably and successfully conducted the affairs of this Presidency, I must make this remark, I believe to a great extent all the good qualities of these great and distinguished men are united together in Sir Bartle Frere. In honouring him Bombay honours itself, and I firmly believe that the value of example in a moral, intellectual, and social point of view, will still be many years hence.

Mr. JAKES TAYLOR then read the Address proposed to be presented to Excellency Sir Bartle Frere. It was as follows:—

GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.

HONORABLE SIR,—We, the undersigned Inhabitants of Bombay, desire to approach your Excellency on the occasion of your retirement from the office of Governor of this Presidency, to express the deep * me entertain of the signal services you have rendered, not merely in your capacity of Governor of Bombay, but also in various high offices in this and other parts of India, in the course of m distinguished public career extending over m period of thirty-two years.

With feelings of pride and satisfaction are carried back to the time when your Excellency, young member of the Bombay Civil Service, took an active part in the introduction of the great prior for an improved Survey and Assessment of the Government lands in this Presidency, which has wrought such a beneficial change in the condition of the agricultural population.

In the early years of your public career, the interest you took in the welfare of the Maratha people led you in that close study of their manners, customs, and language, which shortly afterwards proved of such advantage to the State, when you were called upon by the Government of the time to administer the whole civil authority of the lapsed territory of Sattara.

. We thankfully recognise the ability and cornectness with which, — Commissioner in Sind, you applied yourself to the work of developing the recourses and improving the civil administration of a Province barely settled when you first became connected with it, — its ruler.

The liberal enlightened spirit which guided your administration in Sind beervable in the rapid growth of its commerce, in the energy with which canals and other works of irrigation pushed forward, notwithstanding the inadequate placed your disposal; in the persevering efforts made for the improvement of the Harbour of Karachi, of the finter-communication in the interior by opening up roads, and the introduction of a Railway; and at the close of your administration your Excellency had the satisfaction of seeing the Province in a state of order and quiet, with progress steadily prevailing in every district of the country.

With feelings of deepest gratitude we think of the magnitude of the services you rendered to the State during the trying period of the mutiny in 1857-58.

Though responsible for the peace of a Province which but recently been thoroughly subjected to British rule, and with only small force at your disposal, considered barely sufficient for its requirements, your Excellency thought not of yourself, but of those who placed in circumstances of greater peril, and, on your responsibility, promptly sent aid to the full extent of your power to the districts that were in danger and distress.

At commencement of the revolt you hurried up European and Native troops to the assistance of the Panjanb Government; and when the Government of Lord Elphinstone impressed by mutiny Kolapore and symptoms of disaffection elsewhere, your Excellency speedily despatched to Bombay and other parts

The services of your Excellency during this crisis in the history of our Indian Empire, received emphatic public recognition from some of the leading statesmen of the time, and were, honoured with the thanks of both houses of Parliament.

The of your Excellency member of the Government of India remarkable for the ability and energy with which you supported the financial of the Government, under circumstances of considerable novelty and difficulty; and you had the satisfaction of seeing those brought to a successful completion. During your short tenure of office member of Lord Canning's Government you gave the most cordial support to every measure of public improvement and usefulness.

When your Excellency came amongst us, five years ago, as Governor of the Presidency in which you began your career in the public service, your appointment was everywhere hailed with feelings of heart-felt satisfaction.

During the administration of your Excellency, public improvements have been either initiated, or the groundwork of them laid, to mextent far exceeding what had been done in any previous period of our local history.

Soon after your assumption of the office of Governor, work which had been considered and recommended by some of your predecessors, the demolition of the old Fort Ramparts, was, we the earnest representation of your Excellency's Government, sanctioned by the Secretary of State, and vigorously carried out.

The value of this work, in giving improved ventilation to the buildings within the Fort, and in enlarging the very limited means previously at the disposal of Government, for building and other purposes, cannot be overrated; and it is earnestly hoped that the public buildings, and other public works of usefulness and ornament, which your Excellency's Government has planned and sanctioned, some one of your man immediate more may have the satisfaction of seeing carried forward, and at no distant date successfully completed.

The munificent liberality of some public-spirited citizens of Bombay, supplemented by the generous aid accorded to their plans by your Government, have enabled us to me the new Elphinstone and Poons Colleges, and a College at Poons for the instruction of the Natives of the country in Civil Engineering, not merely founded, but in rapid progress towards completion; and a building worthy of our rising University, for which funds have been provided in part by private citizens and in part by Government, we hope soon to see commenced.

To your Excellency's Government in indebted for the creation of the new Municipality, by the formation of the Bench of Justices into a body corporate; and the vigour and ability with which many sanitary have since been entered upon, and the local improvements of kinds now in progress, amply justify the wise policy of your Government in affording scope to the enterprise of the citizens under a system of Municipal self-government.

To your Excellency's Government we have to express making metals and that have been taken for the improvement of the Harbour, and the better accommodation of the Shipping. Your Excellency, at many personal inconvenience, lately assisted at laying the corner-stone of a Lighthouse on the Island of Kennery, which, after long discussion, making the completed, will be intestimable boon to the Shipping, especially to vessels making for Bombay in the storms of the South-west Monsoon.

Your Excellency's Government has had the estisfaction of seeing the successful completion of the great undertaking which directly connects India with England, by Electric Telegraph, and your part in a work so calculated to promote the common interests of both countries, and recognised by the Secretary of State, when he expressed his ' of the value of your zealous and energetic co-operation in a work which has been brought to a prosperous conclusion.'*

The people of Western India are deeply indebted to your Excellency for the persevering energy and zeal with which you have pressed upon the Governments of India and England the necessity for lines of Railway to connect Bombay with Rajpootana, Delhi, and other parts of Northern India, and from Kotree to Mooltan to connect the Panjaub with the seaboard at Karachi, by continuline through Sind. The value and importance of these proposed lines of Railway alike on commercial, military, and political grounds, would be difficult to exaggerate; and it is a satisfaction to to know that when you part from us here, we can still count your influence and advocacy in support of these projects in your place the Indian Council.

The great work of Education has made rapid progress in Western India during the period of your Excellency's administration. English and Vernacular Schools have been opened, and are fast multiplying in every district of the Presidency. The system of grants-in-aid has been introduced, and by an important clause in the recent Revenue Survey and Settlement Act, a local cess for schools and roads is allowed to be made, from which very important results may be expected to follow. The higher education of our Colleges been powerfully aided by the sympathy and public canction which your Excellency has afforded to the authorities of University, in the efforts they making for the creation of a high standard of scholarship amongst the educated youth of the country.

How much the cause of Native Female Education in this Presidency, and with it social improvement in the largest sense, has been advanced by the patronage and support of your Excellency, we feel more strongly than we are well able to express. No work of public charity has been founded, institution of educational character inaugurated amongst us, without your Excellency having assisted, and by words of counsel and encouragement given strength and support to the undertaking.

The min in which you have ever made yourself accessible to all classes of the community, the kindness, courtesy, and urbanity which have invariably characterised your intercourse with them, and the sympathy with their best interests commently displayed in your public addresses, will leave a deep and lasting impress on the people of Western India.

In conclusion we have to ask your Excellency's permission to place your Statue in the Town Hall, beside those of some of the most eminent of your predecessors, so a visible memorial to future generations, of the affectionate regard for your personal character, and the heartfelt gratitude and admiration for your public services, entertained by the people who have participated in the blessings of your rule.

In earnest hope and trust that, by the blessing of God, your Excellency may long be spared in life and health to continue to your Sovereign and your country in ever-increasing sphere of usefulness, whether in England elsewhere, respectfully and affectionately bid you—Farewell.

REVIEWED JOHN HARDING, LORD BISHOP - BOWRAY; in moving - next resolution, said:—

, Sir, -I feel that the Address which has just been read to meeting spoken for itself, and that no words from me - be required to commend to the cordial approbation of every individual here present. It is a complete survey of the services which Sir Bartle Frere rendered to Presidency, survey which with the of Government of it but from the period when he set foot on India's shores. From that time to the present hour his whole been one of public utility, utility which lays Presidency under obligation him which no number of years will wipe away. I feel, Sir, after such a survey, and after the lucid sketch which Honorable the Advocate General gave - the sum subject, after the facts which have been mentioned by the Rev. Dr. Wilson and others, is not for me to attempt to magnify the subject which is before me to me to the statement by which the resolutions have been already carried in support of it. There is only one point which I would venture to make a remark, and in doing so I echo only the sentiment which fell from yourself in those fitting remarks with which you opened the business of the evening. You alluded to Sir Bartle Frere's personal character. Now it is upon point that I wish make a very few remarks, because although when I look around this Hall I the representatives of various and the representatives of various faiths, yet I am sure that, in this point people all agree that whatever may be a man's comprehensiveness of intellectual power. whatever may be his faculty of expounding his views upon political and social subjects, with an eloquence which attracts attention, whatever may administrative talent, whatever may be his success, still these mot command the full and entire approbation of his fellow-men. Personal virtue must be added to these, or that commendation will not be awarded. Now, Sir, it bere that feel that Sir Bartle Frere has a special claim upon our respect and affection. I feel that that personal virtue which been enabled by God's mercy to maintain throughout whole ourser is to the whole circumstances of a career, just what a bright and sky in to a beautiful prospect. | out the whole in lustre brilliancy. When we look at great men-and there are such in of history, when we look upon a man whose very name has been by many services to his country, I feel that I we dare not follow beyond the precincts of his public life, if we dare not with him home, if we dare not enquire what are his personal habits, that a melancholy impression is left on the pages of history. There are such men on the

of history, and we should felt a deep and sad impression is our hearts if we could not have followed Sir Bartle Frere from his public life to his private life and seen that he was no less distinguished abilities in the one was distinguished for his virtues in the other. In beauty of a virtuous course before the eye of a jealous, but always an observant world, the sanctity of domestic life the precincts of a home which threw open its doors to every eve around, a is this which commends Sir Bartle Frere's career to a our respect and reverence which will be felt by every here present just in proportion to his own personal excellence. Now, Sir, I have honour to move a resolution which echoes the concluding pressures of Address which has just been read. It is to the following effect :-- "That the Address now read be presented to fir Bartle Frere, and that a public subscription be commenced for the erection of a statue to be placed in the Town Hall of Bombay, and for the presentation to His Excellency of such a personal testimonial as a committee of subscribers may be easter determine." there is a great excellence in the resolution which Committee have entrusted to my hands, because it wo things which I am sure will command our priversal support, a Statue which shall as long as Bombay stands to commemorate the virtues of our Governor. a present which he shall take with him home to stand as long as will within his house. I memorial of Bomkay's gratitude, I go to his children after him and to be pointed out as the memorial which his career of usefulness excellence obtained from his fellow-citizens. It is a very happy idea that the citizens of Bombay should have before this Hall a memorial of so great and so good a man, and that and and family have before their eyes continually the record of what Bombay has felt for his long course of excellence and virtue.

Sir,—I am of opinion that the Address, which has been read deserves our full approbation, and I feel perfectly confident that all the sections our community will cordially endorse it. I say all the sections, and these words all the sections will be, I think, the greatest satisfaction to highly-esteemed Governor whom we regret to address for the time. It is in fact one of the striking features of the administration of Sir Bartle Frers that his continual endeavours have been promote welfare of the Presidency of Bembay without omitting look, let me say, by continually looking, to the interests of each and every section, whatever may be the nation, whetever the religious community they belong to. We all have had the gratification to hear a great deal political career of our parting Governor; the gentlemen who have preceded me given the account of it with great ability and cloquence. I wish only to add a few words on what, I am happy to state and thankful to acknowledge, he has done for the community I represent. That community, I am assured. feels highly gratified to have in assembly an interpreter of sentiments it entertains for our revered Governor, and all the members, I no hesitation to say, join in the feelings expressed here. Many lasting monuments will make them always look back at the short time of Sir Bartle's reign, with delight, with affection, and sincere gratitude. It is during with affection of the administration of Sir Bartle, it is under his protection and with his that an asylum has been opened at Poons for the female children of our soldiers as well as for the orphan "girls of the native community. II is under the same protection and with the assistance that another asylum for 150 soldiers' boys and for as many destitute native boys is in course of erection in Neebit Lane at Byculla and now approaches completion. There is no doubt but without the protection and the assistance mentioned. I would never have been able to raise the said asylums to the level in which I am happy to see them. On many occasions I with my own eyes our Governor and the noble-hearted Lady Frere encourage, by their presence and their words, the generous exertions of those who took upon themselves the heavy burden of the education of so many soldiers' children. If the funds now and then were not sufficient for the maintenance of large number of the inmates, Lady Frere was ready to give the powerful assistance of her patronage, now to a concert, then to a fancy fair, in aid of the funds, always with the same kindness and always with the same pros-On a late occasion His Excellency himself condescended to secrifice his valuable moments to go a great distance to examine and to encourage the poor boys who are under my patronage, with that dignified affibility which cannot fail, and has not failed, | leave happiest impressions in those young hearts. So come to other instances of Sir impartial protection, I shall state that upon cocasion a law framed and was already in force, which, I feel inclined to think, any unkind intention on the part of those who had been connected with the work, was particularly onerous, I might even my ignominious, to munity under my care. One interview with the Governor mough to give full hope of redress, and, in fact, the meeting of Legislative Council highly-esteemed friend, Sir Henry Lacon Anderson, made the requested modifications, beyond which we desire nothing.

Marriage Act. I shall not enter into other details. Suffice it to every favour obtained bore with it is testimony that was always pleased to extend the liberality as 📰 🖚 limits of 🔛 power permitted, and a refusal, if at times I had to meet with any, bore we sign of its being beyond the limit of his power to act differently. All this, I assure you, is highly appreciated by the Catholic community. I wish, however, to be properly understood by those whom I represent, and of whom might find fault with me when I am speaking as I do. Though I am gratified to give the greatest praise to the impartiality of Sir Bartle, we cannot deny that there is still a certain and of inequality prevailing. This remark may appear somewhat strange, but I feel me hesitation to give expression to it before this assembly. I know too well we spirit which the gentlemen here present, many of whom I have the honour to call my friends, and I would not be doing justice to their liberal feelings and to their wish for equal protection to be granted to all, if I manifested the slightest fear in alluding to a state of things which they disapprove of as well as I do myself. But it would be the greatest injustice to lay blame of this inequality on the noble Sir Bartle Frere, and I wish all the members of the community under my care to bear in mind that there are laws and regulations binding the Governor as well as all those who governed by him; beyond the limits of laws he cannot go. laws are sad remains of old times : gradually they will sink down. All that can be expected from a Governor | that the application of laws be made in as favourable a way as possible. In this, I can state, revered Governor has never been deficient, always he has favoured us the interpretation and the mildest application the existing was capable of. To expect anything more would be injudicious. To have emjoyed the benefit of is a most for which sincere and everlasting gratitude is due. I therefore second, and cordially second, without any hesitation second, in the name of the section of the community I present, the resolution that an Address be presented and a Statue creeted. This much is deserved from that section of the community, I is deserved, as we have been gratified to hear, by all the other sections. Holy Providence has disposed things in such a way that besides the reward in world come there is a reward given in this world. I am of opinion and of the greatest rewards in this world is the satisfaction expressed by whom man has sacrificed his labour and his life. On this principle I the resolution must be adopted. Let the departing Governor have ward in full. Let gratitude be manifested, gratitude by all and every gratitude in the hest means in our power, gratitude now and in

Let this gratitude be to für Bartle a partial reward for all has done, be be for the future Governors a continual encouragement in follow his steps, and in them always be supported by this idea:—what I is going bestow upon each and every section of the Bombay community, is bestowed upon those who know how to appreciate a beneficial Government, and in whose minds I shall leave lasting remembrances.

RAO SARRO VISHVANATH NARAYAN MANDLIK SAID:-

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen.—I have much pleasure in seconding resolution which has just been proposed by the Rev. Mr. Fletcher. speakers before have well-nigh exhausted the subject. The Hon'ble Advocate General given a narrative of the career of Sir Bartle Frere, Other speakers have likewise dwelt upon his brilliant achievements. The Rev. Dr. Wilson has brought out many reminiscences and scenes which up the gap in what would otherwise have been almost a bare outline. Now, Sir, when we look to the man of Sir Bartle Frere, and a naturally tempted ask, how this gentleman, a member of the Bombay Civil Service rose which position of merited distinction. I was those who have closely watched his will agree with me that the rise of Sir Bartle Frere is due to his vast energy, untiring perseverance, prodigious industry and wonderful capacity of adapting to ends. Whether we look Assistant Collecter in the Konkan, or Assistant Revenue Commissioner in the Deccan; whether in his post of Commissioner of Sattara, or m the pro-consul of Sind, swaying the affairs of Young Egypt and anxiously watching the keys of India on the Affghan and Belooch frontier; whether we view him as the confidential adviser of Lord Canning or as a Governor of this Presidency, the capacity of adapting means to ends is to be observed. The Natives of this Presidency have him for encouraging education. The Public Works Department also testify to his immense industry and foresight. India been visited by dire famines during the last few years; first, the N. W. Provinces, then Bengal, and lastly, Madras. In Bombay I would undertake to say that, by wise and extended organisation of public works, the Government of Bartle Frere (to the words of intelligent native gentleman well acquainted with the Public Works Department of Bombay) has, m it were, anticipated the famine, and broke down its severity = considerable extent, or we should have had a fearful account to give of several parts of this Presidency. Gentlemen, this meeting has assembled to pronounce what may venture | call | political verdict on the administration of Sir Bartle Frere. That verdict is unanimous; and is success. To carry this verdict into effect, assembly proposes appoint, by the resolution which have honour of seconding, a Committee will have the pleasing carrying out described bere today. These remarks, beg to second the now placed before meeting.

Mr. CHARLES COURSE begged to move—"That meeting given to the Honourable Alexander John Hunter for taking their."

Dr. Bhau Dast, in seconding and resolution, spoke as follows:

Sir,-In seconding the resolution entrusted to me, I desire to speak a few words. When Sir Bartle Frere was nominated Governor of Bombay, appointment hailed with pleasure by those who had studied character, and could we help then remarking that Sir Bartle Frere bade fair to rival Mountatuart Elphinstone in all that was great and good. This expectation have thesitation in saying has been fully realized. Sir Bartle Frere's liberal encouragement of education has been justly preised, if,—as well observed in the address to Mountstuart Elphinstone, that his name shall be the first that me children shall learn to hep—that of Sir Bartle Frere should I the second. To continue the parallel. A sincere tribute of applause due Sir Bartle Frere, not only on account of the highly liberal and enlightened principles by which his public conduct has been so peculiarly characterized, but because his private virtues have particularly excited admiration, gratitude, and respectful affection. The accessibility, the absence of all form, and the urbanity with which Sir Bartle has always received persons of this country of all classes, and the affable and unrestrained manner with which he has condescended to mix in their society, can only be ascribed as in the me of Elphinstone, those amiable, generous, and high-minded sentiments which shine - conspicuously in his every word and action. In fact no truer or wiser friend have the natives of this country found than Bartle Frere. Having spent the best period of his life in active and arduous duties in this country; having minutely studied its languages and the customs of its people, Sir Bartle Frere's sympathies could not but be with those arms whom he has raled with min industry, ability, and wisdom. No Governor in this country can be great or good without throwing his four doors open, is without making himself freely accessible. Five years ago I visited the principalities of Bengal, Behar, and the North-West Provinces, and whenever the name of Sir Bartle Frere mentioned, Native Eurospoke of him in the warmest terms of praise. Last year I visited Central and Eastern India, there indeed | with many natives who heard of Sir Burtle Frere, but they at the time did not know where Bombay was, or that under British rule. To show that thing escaped the vigilant eye of Bartle Frere, I will will will instance. On wery day of introduction, Rartle something to say to every one who he thought was inclined to be useful to his country. His Excellency suggested - desirability of examining ancient

Mr. MANOCEJI CURSETJI said he begged to propose the last, but not the least important resolution. It might be said to be the night cap of proceedings like the present. It was-"That thanks and due the Sheriff for having convened this meeting." Having himself been Sheriff twice knew what the duties of the office were : they ____ rather of a responsible than of monerous character. Sir Bartle Frere had manifested his regard for the Natives of India by choosing a Native on the last occasion of his appointing a Sheriff; and the gentleman so selected had worthily discharged his duties this day. There was point which he found had been entirely omitted in the speeches on this occasion; and was a subject which might jocularly be said to be one of his hobbies. Much had been said about female education, in the spread of which Sir Bartle Frere had taken a most prominent, a most forward, and a active part. But Sir Bartle had not only encouraged it by his public addresses and by attending examinations; he had also done so by exercising waluable influence with those influential and worthy natives of Bombay who-in manner creditable to their conciliatory feelings than likely achieve grand object in view-stood for time opposed to the There was another matter in which Sir Bartle Frere had taken great interest, and that was, the bringing of native ladies out in public. was perhaps no object to which higher importance should be attached than that of bringing native ladies to a proper position with regard to society and Sir Bartle had exerted himself both in public and by exercise of his private influence . great end-and he had in manner succeeded in attaining it. motion was seconded by Mr. Rowland Hamilton, and carried.

The foregoing Address was presented to His Excellency Sir Henry Bartle Edward Frere, at Government House, Parel, on the 25th. February by the Honourable A. J. Hunter.

Honourable Mr. Hunter and Gentlemen; -I perfectly III I loss to express adequately the feeling I experience receiving the Address which has just been read from the Inhabitants of Bombay. Your kind judgment has attributed to credit than I deserve for what I have been able to do during my term of office. Wherever I have gone I have always found friends and fellow-labourers among my fellow-countrymen, and the natives of this land, who have heartily and earnestly themselves to work to carry out whatever I have thought it my duty to plan, and if I have been successful in anything, the credit is m much due to them m to me. I feel this to be particularly the case with regard to _____ of the ____ to which you have alluded in the Address. It is true I took the very warmest interest from the very first in the great manner of the settlement of the Revenue Survey, which originated with my late friend, Mr. H. E. Goldsmid, and with his able coadjutor, Sir George Wingate, which I look upon a me of the greatest and best results of the administration of this part of British India during the last thirty years. I feel certain that, for ages to come, its good will will remain. In the property of this measure is much due to the of officers who have been charged with carrying out, with those who originated it. So with regard what you have about my labours member of the Governor-General's Council Calcutta. I laboured earnestly, and the best my power to support the measures of Lord Camping's Government when James Wilson engaged in a arduous of restoring the fluances of India. I III my best to aid the great work they had in hand, from the conviction that what Lord Canning and his advisors and doing and done in a noble spirit, and would tend the prosperity and permanence of Empire in India; and it is only . fellow-labourer of theirs that I can claim any credit for what done. For what you have said of my since I have been Governor of this Presidency, I am only return you my most heartfelt and carnest thanks. Of some of these I have already spoken in replying to the Addresses from the Bench of Justices and the Chamber of Commerce. There are many others which I would gladly refer to fully, were there a fitting opportunity for me to speak more of the policy of the Government of this Presidency during the past five years; but I feel that you have set me wery fitting example in touching only on those points which a general agreement may be expected. I would gladly, if I had me opportunity, enter at length upon many points to which I have not yet referred; but I shall content myself with expressing to you the deep sense I entertain of what you have said regarding me at this particular moment. The years which I have passed among you as Governor of this Presidency have been in almost equal proportion years of extraordinary presperity and excitement and of equally unparalleled adversity and depression. Had I been leaving you, and had you spoken of me you have done at the flood-tide of your prosperity. I should have felt proud and grateful to you; but I am quite at a loss to express fitly to you, my acknowledgment for what you have said of me at the present time, so soon after passing through the gloomiest season of adversity. To the Inhabitants of Bombay, through you, Gentlemen, who have presented in this Address, I would return my heartfelt thanks for the great honour they have done me. They could do nothing which I should prize more highly, than to place my Statue in their Town Hall among those of the great men who have gone from among us, and of whom I have known, and loved, and reverenced, and all of whom I have, according to my light power, in some degree striven to imitate.

[Bombay, IIII February 1867.]

In bringing forward the subject of an Address to Sir Bartle Frere, on his retirement from the Government of Bombay, the Chairman (Andrew Richard Sconer Esq.) said:—

I am sure I need use very few words to recommend this proposal attentive consideration of all the gentlemen here present—and I think we shall agree in this, that of all the Governors Bombay has the had, there has never been one who has had the interests of Bombay sincerely at heart, my ho has shown more intelligent appreciation of those interests than has His Excellency Sir Bartle Frere. Not only with regard to the constitution of this Bench and the powers which under his government have been conferred upon it, has His Excellency shown himself more liberal and broad in view than ordinary Indian statesmen, but I believe I may say that in every department of his administration he has shown what my mind is of the greatest importance in connection with the future of this country-and that is, he has invited the non-official portion of the community take a share in the administration of public affairs. In language eloquent than I have at command, the University of Bombay testified their wise and enlightened policy he has pursued with regard to that learned body by introducing all the cultivated thought of which Presidency can boast into the governing body of reat educational institution. And in regard to this Beach, which I take to be the most thoroughly independent public body that exists in this country, the constant endeavour of His Excellency has been to make a representative body to which he feels he may safely leave the sound of the civic interests of the community of the Island. Similar bodies . Bench exist in Calcutts and Madras, but they are under a much greater degree of control = the part of the central governments. Here, the administration of Bartle Frere has shown itself jealous in its and of the newly acquired powers of the Bench, and anxious not to interfere with the due exercise of powers. I think therefore that a body like this, which owes its existonce in great measure to Sir government, should testify to the claim which His Excellency upon gratitude for line footing which, thanks to statesmanlike liberality, we have placed, and I have very great pleasure in proposing that an be presented to Sir Bartle Frere, on his retirement from an government Bombay.

HONOURABLE MANGALDAS NATRUBROY seconded motion.

RAO SAHER VISHVANATH NARAYAN MANDLIN said the proposition which had just been submitted . meeting by their worthy Chairman and seconded by the Hon'ble Mr. Mangaldas Nathubhov was which be acceptable to the Bench in a very peculiar manner. He thought the free discussion of municipal matters was a thing that was and indigenous in this country. In antiquarian times there might have been forms of Municipal government, and when the present Municipal Act of Bombay and discussed, it was by gentleman that there particular facilities for Municipal government in India. By that he (Mr. Mandlik) supposed the speaker have the village system which was very ancient, and which, if reformed, would facilitate the introduction of Municipal government to very great extent; but the model of all such institutions, the Presidency municipality was the to which all must tend, and there was no doubt that the Government of a country like India could do much to strengthen the of the Municipality well to aid their work without its influence being seen; and where the experiment of municipal administration was an on foot under the - Act, the character of that municipal administration was be influenced by the Government, which was legally the superior, of Municipal institutions. And he had no hesitation in saying that the governof Sir Bartle Frere had ever courted a free discussion of all measures started by the Bench. m which had been sent to them for their opinion. Allusion had been made to the municipal bedies existing Madras and at Calcutta. He had no wish to disparage any sister institution this in any part of India, but he any he proud of Bombay Municipality, of which present component parts; and for the reason he thought whatever differences there had been among the constituent of Bench, or between the Bench and the Government of Bombay which watched the Municipality with so much care—the various brought forward always been broadly and intelligently discussed with view to the solution of many difficult and intricate questions raised. For all these reasons, he thought they owed a deep of gratitude | departing Governor who had watched | that, as | many other institutions in country with a solicitude and interest not been surpassed, and which he are often been equalled in country.

Mr. Doseabhoy France said he could not allow proposition named-as he are no doubt it would be most heartily-without saying few words the subject himself. The great interest which Bartle Frere had taken in the affairs of the Municipality would be observed by the perusal of the reports of the discussions in the Legislative Council when Act II. of 1865 under consideration, and those who had watched the progress of the measure and read the reports with attention could not have failed to see the great amount of interest, and the watchful care which His Excellency had displayed throughout with regard to the Municipal affairs of the city. He remembered very well meeting the late Hon'ble Mr. Jagannath Sankarsett occasion, and having some conversation with him about the Bill, and he should never forget what Mr. Pankarsett said, for he remarked "Sir Bartle Frere has paid great attention to this Bill, and so long - he is the head of the Covernment, the interests of the Municipality will suffer." Since then they had had full evidence of the unceasing interest which His Excellency had manifested in the affairs of the Municipality. and he would only mention one instance of that. In making selections among the native community for members of the Bench, Sir Bartle Frere went beyond what his predecessors had done with regard to notive gentlemen, for he did not confine himself I the ranks of the landed proprietors-and in saying that, he cast reflection whatever on the landed gentry-but selected native gentlemen who belonged me the middle classes; they were the classes most deeply interested in the welfare of the city, and he believed that His Excellency's intention - to make the Municipality the representative of the native community. In former times mative Justices and appointed from among the wealthier classes. Among those classes there had been, and ____ undoubtedly many good and true men, but the present constitution of the Bench was the one which really represented the native community. Those who had watched by progress of the Municipality knew that in former years—and although not a member of the Bench at the time he referred to, yet from his former connection with the press of the city he had observed it—the European members of Municipality had it all their own way. He did not cast the least reflection them for the way in which they exercised their influence, for they acted the best of their belief for the benefit of the Municipality; but still formerly the native community was not sufficiently represented, whereas they knew, there was an honourable and healthy rivalry among the different sections of the community in the discussions of Bench. And discussion always brought forth a correct result. To Sir Frere native community owed much for sending proper representatives to III Bench, and they would all cordially join in the Address to His Excellency. Governor by the Chairman on the HI February 1867, on behalf of Her Majesty's Bench of Justices.

To His Excellency

Sir HERRY BARTLE EDWARD FRENE, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., Governor of Bombay.

Your Excellency.—We, the Justices of the Peace for the City of Bombay, desire to approach your Excellency on your return to your native land—after thirty-three years of laborious service in this country—with superpression of our grateful appreciation of the many important benefits which the city of Bombay has derived from your Excellency's administration as Governor of this Presidency during the past five years.

Your Excellency was among the first to estimate its true value the importance of the municipal element in the Government of this country, and three great periods your Excellency's career marked by the initiation, first at Sattara, afterwards in Sind, and finally in city, of a system of municipal self-government which we are well assured already contributed and will in future years add yet more largely, the political and material advancement of the people of Western India.

It is of the first acts of your Excellency as Governor of Bombay, appoint a Commission to enquire into and report upon the sanitary condition and requirements of this city; and the comprehensive and practical report, in which the labours of that Commission is embodied, has proved the starting-point of great municipal improvements already effected, as well a store-house of wise counsel in regard to those hereafter be accomplished.

An immediate' result of this report was the Municipal Act of 1865, whereby the Justices of the Peace, who heretofore had been restricted an almost nominal connection with administration of municipal affairs, erected into a body corporate, invested with the control of municipal funds, and invited to undertake, with the cordial co-operation your Excellency's Government, those sanitary reforms and other great municipal improvements of which their city stands so much in need.

your Excellency's Government has rendered to the city of Bombay.

The removal of the ramparts, the second of the population, the elaboration of a second of the effectual drainage of the town, the extension of the water supply, the improvements of the markets and roads, among the chief matters which have engaged your Excellency's attention, and received your efficient support; and we rejoice to observe that while your Excellency apparently regarded the improvement of this city as a matter of imperial importance, and has recognized the great future in store for Bombay when a shall have become the centre of the railway communications of this empire and the commercial capital of Hindustan, you have declared your confidence in ability of its citizens to prepare for that future untrammelled by control of State interference.

In taking leave of your Excellency, we would express hope your life may long be spared render service to India in the position to which you have been called; and while we feel convinced it is necessary for to be speak for the city of Bombay a place in your memory, and such future service as may be in your power bestow, desire your Excellency that it is with no feeling of regret that bid your Excellency respectfully farewell.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. EFRERE replied.—

Mr. Scoble,-I would beg you as Chairman to express to the Bench of Justices my cordial thanks for your Address, which I shall greatly value a proof that on one subject to which I have devoted much time and attention during my residence among you, my labour has not been altogether in vaiu. It is not only of late years that I have learnt mostly to value the importance of the municipal element in the Government of India. But I cannot claim to have been by any means among the first to recognise this great truth for I find that from the very earliest period since England took maker in the Government of India, all who knew most of the people of India by knowledge acquired outside a Government office, and all who most strongly the importance of governing people of India through the people of India, in the of estimating most highly the municipal element of Government, and of lamenting the inevitable tendency of a centralizing adminiabreak down such municipal institutions as existed, in hinder the growth of any others in their stead. In your I claim no other merit than that of taking the carliest opportunity to act me a truth which had long been recognised by of the wisest and best of my predecessors, though the time for giving practical effect to their views long in arriving. Until other systems had been tried and failed it would have been but of little to attempt such a system as we have now at work : and I have specially to thank you, Gentlemon, and more particularly your Chairman and your Municipal Commissioner, for the sucwhich has attended the experiment. In every age and in every country there has always been a discussion going on-which will probably continue as long as there is any city romaining the face of the earth-and that is the great controversy between the merits of the imperial and the municipal mode of governing large cities. Upon the hand, we have the advocates of imperial system from the times of Nimrod and the Pharaohs, through the ages of the Casars and down to the present moment. Those claim great results no doubt, and in no part of the world can they claim greater, - appeal to more magnificent monuments of the imperial system, than in India. If the name of the Cassars had not been given already it this form of government, it would have been remembered in India the system of the great Achar in every great Mahomedan city of India, and its monuments will last | long | India is | country. Upon the other hand, | have municipal torm of government for great cities and I think may claim we examples of its working the great cities of ancient Greece and of we own middle ages - system which has given us London and Edinburgh, Oxford and Cambridge; which has given to the Netherlands, to Northern Italy and to Germany, all the glories of their great and ancient cities and the treasures of which are their boast. If we were to choose merely between parative material results, we might well be in doubt which system was the best for India. If our object is merely to create a beautiill city full of magnificent buildings, then m might well adopt the imperial system. But we seek something better and permanent than the material monuments of Acbar's greatness. We wish to leave in our city we evidence of that growth and which shall give permanence and prevent change of system with every change of ruler, and which shall in turn be the germ of further progress in future ages. The imperial system requires succession of Acbars, not only great and wise rulers, but rulers of limitless and uncontrolled power. But if could hope for these essentials, the spirit of the imperial system is atterly opposed to the genius slike of we own nation and of those rule over; and should perforce be driven back English municipal system of local self-government, which, whatever may be its faults. I believe to be the system possible for the administration of a large Indian city like this, under such a Government would not have stated my views on the subject m such length, but the imperial system has always its advocates in India well win Europe, and we are frequently tempted by its great immediate and apparent results to forget the merits of our own Saxon system, which has much which is congenial to the ancient in genous customs in India. I will not attempt to follow you through the long list of the objects of your labours. I cannot help calling to mind, however, that within these walls I heard, many years ago, the first discussions regarding many which have since had an important influence your city. bere that I heard from my old friend, Mr. George Clarke, the Civil Engineer, his first proposals for the construction of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, and I am glad to have this opportunity of doing justice to his claim on the pioneer of and Indian railway system, by bearing my testimony to the fact that he the first to propose the actual construction of am Indian railway." Here, too, I heard discussed between him and your predecessor, the then Chairman of the Bench, Mr. Robert Wygram Crawford. present member for London, the first proposals for a good water suppl and efficient system of drainage. But neither these nor any other great _____ in hand could have been attempted, far less carried out, without the aid of intelligent, educated, and public-spirited body of men like those whom you represent; and I me glad to have this opportunity of expressing my sense of the manner in which they have discharged the public duties entrusted to them. I have often thought that w better proof could hardly have been given of the general fitness of the educated classes in Bombay to discharge their duties as citizens than their conduct when the Census was taken-one of those meswhich you good enough to rank among the useful results achieved since I have been Governor here. It will be in the recollection of many here present, that, at the time, we obliged to depend almost entirely for the carrying out of the Census - the influence and public spirit of the better educated classes of nativos. The measure one which even in Europe is not easy to carry out on account of its inherent difficulties, and it mainly due to the voluntary exertions of the educated classes that our Census effected with such little difficulty and with such accurate rosults. In every other matter connected with the welfare of the city, we have had to acknowledge the very great assistance which we have received from the discussions and the labours of the Bench : and I have o ten felt proud when I have read the account of what has passed at the meetings of the Justices, for I felt that unprejudiced person could read the reports without being convinced that there is a very large and intelligent class of citizens well able to undertake the municipal government of a city like this. And this, Sir, is no light task. We have been lately reminded that Her Majesty the Queen, in all her vast dominions, has but city which is more populous than this, and few which are the seats of such important commercial interests. It numbers twice the population of Glasgow, and there me hardly two of your great English cities which in this respect would, if united, out-number the population with which you have to deal. Then consider the magnitude of the task which the Bench has undertaken to discharge—to make good the omissions and neglect of former ages. and to provide all the vast multitude of people with good air, good water, good roads and everything else which should distinguish the second city of the British Empire. I think, Sir, that to take part in the great work the Municipality has in hand, is an object in no way unworthy of any Englishman who desires to his country in this distant land. It hough the task is great and difficult, I have every confidence be well performed. Much been already effected in a very short time, and look forward with the utmost confidence to the time when shall hear that Bombay has taken her place among cities, owing as much to art at the does to nature and position. We may be well content with those results, if the progress made during the next ten years in a corresponding degree to the progress which has been made since the work fairly taken in hand by the Bench under the present constitution of the municipality. I beg, Sir, that you will express to the Bench my very grateful of the honour which the Justices have done

At a General Meeting of the Members of the Chamber on February 1867, — Address was voted — Bartle Frere — cocasion of his retirement from the office of Governor of Bombay, which — presented to him — Government House, Parel, on the 25th idem, by — Chairman (the Hon'ble A. J. Hunter). It — as follows;—

To HIS EXCELLENCY

SIR HENRY BARTLE EDWARD FREEE, Q. C. S. I., K. C. B.

Governor of Bombay.

HONOURABLE SIR,—On the occasion of your retirement from the office of Governor of Bombay, we, the Members of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, desire respectfully to approach your Excellency to express the sense we entertain of the services you have rendered to the interests of Western India, by the liberal policy which has characterised your Excellency's administration during your five years' rule.

We remember with gratitude the aid which, Commissioner in Sind, you rendered to the infant trade of that province, by the encouragement and facilities afforded to the early mercantile settlers at Karachi, and by the zeal and energy with which you devoted yourself to the development of the country, and the improvement of the means of intercommunication between the Port of Karachi and the interior.

One of the early acts of your Excellency, a assuming the office of Gombay, and to take steps, in so far as the matter lay within the province of your Government, to promote the improvement of the cotton cultivation in this Presidency at a time when the failure of the apply from America, owing to the civil war in the United States, brought distress and privation as large portion of the manufacturing population in England. The efforts then made have been steadily continued, and numerous and valuable experiments have since been carried have already resulted in a remarkable improvement in the cotton cultivation avaious districts of the Presidency.

To your Excellency's Government we are indebted for an measures have taken for the improvement of the Harbour and for accommodation of Shipping.

The Harbour and Pilotage Board was, four years ago, wider basis, which has given to its action greater scope and efficiency; and the Pilotage system of the Harbour has recently been reconstructed applan which a great improvement on that which has been superseded, will, we trust, shortly result in a system of free and open Pilotage. The new Light-house on the Island of Kennery that has been sanctioned by your Excellency's Government will when completed, be an important boom the Shipping of Bombay; and the important work of lighting all the ports and creeks on a coast, already begun, we trust to see steadily, presecuted and completed.

Railway communication in Western and Central India has made remarkprogress during the period of your Excellency's administration, and the people of Western India are under obligations, to your Excellency for the zeal, energy, and ability with which you have present the Governments of India and England the necessity for Railways to connect Bombay with Delhi and Northern India through Rajpootana, and Karachi with Panjaub by the Indus Valley. The proposed lines are absolutely indispensable to develop trade already existing, and to meate it in some importdistricts of Northern India with which Bombay has present trading relations.

We desire to express our grateful appreciation of the consideration and attention which your Excellency's Government has all times given are representation of the Chamber, when, as a public body, have consistent to address Government on questions of mercantile or public interest, of the honor you have done in inviting opinions and suggestions from the Chamber on questions of importance that have been submitted as by your Government.

In retiring from the high office you have filled with much honor to yourself and advantage to the interests of Western India, you carry with you best wishes for your future happiness and prosperity; and earnestly trust that your Excellency may long be spared to continue to in the high office which Majesty has called you.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR H. B. E. FRERE replied ;—

Hunter, and Gentlemen of the Chamber of Commerce,—I have received the Address which the Chamber been good enough to vote to me, with peculiar pleasure, me proof that I shall carry with me on leaving India the goodwill of great commercial body which you represent. The Government of India.

for travellers might be extended, = to bring the native grower and the English cotton buyer face to face, and thus cinate us from a thraldom ignominious indeed, but from which there is now no escape. I verily believe that few, and of the most sanguine of us have # full conception of the vast results which are likely to be produced in the cotton and all other great branches of our trade our means of communicating with the interior of this great continent improve and extend. I used to think that India had but a poor chance of fairly competing with other countries m the great supplier of raw cotton, man under the exceptional circumstances of the past few years; but I that the experience of the past year or two has made me much more hopeful. I have seen provinces like the Panjaub and Rajpootans, which five years ago were entered in best and latest cotton maps producing no cotton for export, contribute largely under the stimulus of high prices. It is true = cannot hope to discover vast wastes capable of immediate conversion into productive cotton fields; there are, no such great reservoirs of material; but there are, I believe, thousand rills hitherto of comparatively small moment, which when united as they may be, by continued peace and improved communications, will tend to swell the great stream of your existing supply. Another question in which the duties of Government and of the commercial body - conterminous, that of checking the adulteration of the staple. I will not enter on the vexed arguments for and against Government interference in this matter. I will only remind you that Government would only desire to act - far as the most enlightened commercial opinion may show to be necessary, and to do simply what the honest dealer in cotton finds desirable for his protection. I had lately opportunity of saying a few words on another very important subject, in which I am glad to think you believe I have done some service—the improvement and conservancy of the Harbour, its pilotage and lighting, which are all matters of primary importance to the trade of this port. We have entrusted them to a Harbour Board, from a conviction that they will be better attended to by such m body than by m department of the Government Secretariat. Our wish was to make the Board as far as possible a body which shall truly and effectually represent all the great interests concerned, and I believe the Board may draw to itself almost any amount of independent authority, by efficiently discharging the duties entrusted to it, and by guarding itself against even unintentional transgression beyond the limit of its legitimate functions. I trust at no distant day that the Board may receive by legislation . permanent corporate constitution; but the practice, extent, and value of its powers will always depend on the way in which these powers exercised than on their exact legal extent. I am glad to have this opportunity of informing the Chamber that the discussion, which has been conducted with m much ability on the subject of graving docks has not been unfruitful of result. By last steamwe received from the Secretary of State a despatch informing ns that he was fully convinced of the necessity for immediate tion in the matter, and that he only awaited a decision scientific question—which he had referred to competent judges—before taking action to supply at once the _____ of docking the large transports which a year hence will, I hope, be running between this and Suez. I trust that we are not far from equally satisfactory progress = regards the question of wet docks; and I = glad to be able to correct misapprehension as to the extent to which I would leave the provision of wet docks to private enterprises. Whether they should or should not be provided in supersession of the present means of loading unloading ships is, I think, u purely commercial question-even more so than the provision of railways or of lines of steam packets, and the docks should, I think, be provided, railways or steam packets are, from commercial capital. But the interests involved are extensive, and the dangers of monopoly sufficiently great to justify at least much Government aid or interference as we find to be useful or desirable, in the see of railways. The management should, I think, be by public trust in which Government should be associated. The subject has, I know, engaged Colonel Straebey's attention | and I am not without hope we may shortly receive from him the outlines of plan which would adequately protect every private interest watch, gradually provide such dock accommodation is called for, not in one locality only, but in three or may be needed.

between Colaba and Mazagon. I must not be tempted to discuss length-much should wish to do so-many other topics you have referred to in your Address, especially what you say regarding railways. I convinced that are railway system is only in its infancy, and that the results which now surprise foreshadow but imperfectly what will attend its future development; and I trust that the guarantee system, to which - already owe so much may do yet more for muthan the marvels it has hitherto accomplished. The Address of the Chamber has alluded to the attention which the Government of Bombay has always accorded to the representations of the Clamber as a public body. It has not been difficult. Sir, for the Government to maintain such attitude towards the Chamber when the proceedings of the Chamber have been habitually marked, not only by much sound and varied information but by so much judgment and such | temperate regard for what ___ due to Government. I have always felt a peculiar pleasure in watching the proceedings of the Chamber, and in marking the growth of the influence it has acquired; for in my earlier days, Mr. John Skinner-who was, I believe, the first Chairman of the Chamber, and who might be considered the founder of that and of more than one useful institution which still exists in Bombay-was a valued and intimate friend of mine. and I have often thought how much he would have rejoiced to see the Chamber more than fulfilling the high expectations he had formed of it. And here, Sir, let me take the last opportunity I may have of expressing my and of the great obligations this Government is under to those of your body who have rendered Government such essential aid as Members of the Governor's Council for making Laws and Regulations. I well that opinions and dirided to the value of legislative machinery and this is not the time nor the place for discussing that question : but I may be allowed to state my more opinion, that there is not one of the great which have been devised of late years for the better administration of the country which | of great importance or likely to produce more valuable results, than association of gentlemen independent of the Government in machinery for making such laws as may be needed. II II am only while discussing questions in the Legislative Chamber and is most valuable: even when the Council Chamber they are frequently able to throw upon questions before a light which we should in vain seek in our public offices and official records. I the more anxious to pay tribute which feel to be due to yourself and the other independent gentlemen who have been associated with me, because I know their aid has often been rendered to the agreat personal sacrifice of convenience and of time, which especially to professional men, is frequently of seeding value. Of the public service thus rendered I would beg to express to you, Sir, and to your fellow members of my Council, my grateful sense; and I will only further beg you to convey to the Chamber of Commerce my cordial thanks for the Address you have read.

[Town Hall, February 1867.]

At the monthly meeting of the above Society which in held in Library Rooms, the Honorary President Dr. John Wilson moved,— "That the best thanks of the Society be offered to Ris Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., for his distinguished patronage of, and personal co-operation with, the Society."

In doing this he said that, in the view of the many and high tributes of gratitude and praise which our retiring Governor had received and was receiving from the public, he would confine himself to the matters referred to in the motion. Sir Bartle's patronage of the Society. and that of his administrative associates, was that not of words but deeds, to it the Society awed the liberal contribution of three hundred rupees monthly in aid of the higher objects of its institution. This patronage had no precedent in the West of India, except perhaps in the gift, through John Malcolm, to the Society of the commodious in which it met. and in which its literary treasures were deposited; and it we very desirable that, in the first instance at least it should be devoted to medific object or historical illustration connected with the Bombay Presidency -say the History of the Marathas, which, notwithstanding the admirable work of Captain James Grant Duff, and 3 et capable of further alucidation and confirmation by the personal and family memoirs of the remarkable personages of Maratha History, and by documents of a similar character which could yet be collected. To facilitate a work of this kind, Sir Bartle Frere had lately encouraged the Maratha Chiefs to collect the memorials of their own houses; and the result of this movement, and of other enquiries which could easily be made, might be the acquisition and publication of valuable documents which might satisfy the curiosity and direct the judgment of inquirers in future times. The co-operation of Sir Bartle with the literary labours of the Society had been frequently brought into play. He had presented the Society with a transcript made by two competent Mahomedan gentlemen of all the inscriptions found in the ruined city of Beejapoor. which contained a few of some value which had not yet been published translated. He also forwarded to Society a list of Sanskrit works found in a temple - Satters. He - done good service to antiquarian research by first bringing matice the extensive series. Buddhist and excavations near the form of Karad, and the termination of the plateaus running eastward from Mahableshwer. He valuable contributor the Government Selections connected with both Sattara Sind. The Society's Journal contains several interesting communications from his pen and those of his correspondents, such his Memorandum of Buddhist excavations near Karad, now referred to; Descriptive Notices of Antiquities in Sind; and Notices, Historical Antiquarian, of places Sind. During his Government of Bombay he had supplied the Society with whatever incidental information he thought might be interesting to its members. It am of simple justice gratefully to knowledge the many favours received the hands of His Excellency.

DR. J. G. BUHLER seconded the motion of Dr. Wilson dwelling is Bartle Frere's patronage of Oriental Literature, and joining in the expression of the hope that the Society would follow up the suggestion now again made about the publication of Documents illustrative of Maratha History.

The foregoing resolution was communicated to His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, to which he replied as follows;—

To

JAMES TAYLOR, Esq,

Honorary Secretary, B. Branch Royal Asiatic Society.

Sir.

I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of the 28th February, transmitting to me a copy of a resolution passed me meeting of the Society on the 14th of that month.

The following Address from the Native Inhabitants of Surat was presented to His Excellency Sir H. B. E. Frere, at Government House, Parel.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,—We the undersigned Inhabitants of Surat feel we should be wanting in duty we to allow your Excellency to depart from among without tendering our most respectful acknowledgments of your Excellency's long, arduous and honorable services for a period of thirty-three years, distinguished as it has been by an ever-increasing desire of doing substantial good the Natives of India. It gives m ordinary satisfaction to observe that the People and Chiefs of the Deccan, amongst whom you spent the earlier part of your brilliant career, have paid your Excellency stitting tribute of exteem and admiration which they entertain for the warm interest you have always taken their permanent welfare.

Situated we are in one of the peaceful corners of Her Majesty's-Indian Dominions, we feel ourselves incapable of fully appreciating the magnitude of your valuable services during the critical period of the mutinies; first - Commissioner of Sind, and afterwards as a Member of the Governor-General's Council-services which have curolled your man among the greatest of British Indian Statesmen. But ■ is as Governor of Bombay that your Excellency has earned a claim the enduring gratitude of the munity which inhabit this part of the Presidency. It would be impossible to do full justice | the seal and contentment of the millions committed | your charge. Whilst the diffusion of popular education, the erection of hospitals, dhurumsalas, and libraries, and the construction of roads and bridges, are proofs of your Excellency's judicious and valuable aid and encouragement of works of public utility, and of the stimulus given to of general imp evement; the marked attention paid to the honest suggestions of the intelligent portion of the native press, the careful enquiries that are being made for the improvement of the existing unsatisfactory and of municipal law, the generally successful endeavours made for advancing the status and prospects of the uncovenanted service, and the augmentingwatchfulness extended to all departments of the State, was the breadth liberality of your views. well to the disinterestedness your labours in behalf of the people at large, and the sincerity of your desire giving greater efficiency to the general administration of the country.

We rass in silence the various legislative of your Excellency's government, calculated for the good and well-being II III Native Society; and beg leave to allude to some of the most important. The for ameliorating the condition of the Talookdars of Guzerat, and the sures adonted for the education of their children, will and doubt long be held as monuments of your carnest wish for the preservation and regeneration of the ancient nobility of India. The passing of special laws for the regulation of Marriage and Succession amongst the Pareces will, it is hoped, contribute not | little to the social hampiness of that section of the native community. The Summary Settlement Act has relieved the fears and strengthened the titles of the Landholders of Guzerat. It must indeed be a source of unmixed pleasure to your Excellency that your generous exertions in the meet of education should have been rewarded by the opportunities your Excellency enjoyed of seeing the Natives of this Presidency bonoured for the first time in your administration with University Degrees for their proficiency in literature and fine arts and in the studies of the liberal professions, and of the enlarging the sphere of their usefulness in the Government of their country-opportunities which we feel certain every English gentleman will be proud to avail of.

It must, we presume, be peculiarly gratifying to Lady Frere that the vivid interest she has along with your Excellency always manifested in encouraging the education of females has also borne fruit in this and other provinces.

The services rendered by your Excellency to the cause of humanity in effectually persuading the Gaikwar to relinquish for the modes of punishment obtaining in his territories, repugnant to the sense and feelings of the civilised portion of mankind, will with pleasure be remembered by the people of Guzerat for generations to come, to your Excellency's lasting credit. The relief afforded to the Chief of Dhurrumpore will also not be easily forgotten by the friends of that unhappy prince. To mark the high sense which they entertain of the benefits conferred on Guzerat under your Excellency's benign rule, measures are being adopted by the people of city for the perpetuation of your memory by raising a fund for the annual sward of two prizes to the best girls in the Hindu and Parsi Female Schools respectively.

In conclusion, we earnestly implore the most Gracious Father of all that He may in infinite kindness bless you, your family, and children with honour, happiness, and general prosperity; and that He may long spare you, to assist by your beneficent advice in behalf of the teeming millions of this country, the Secretary of State for India, who made a happy and addition in his Council.

REPLY ABOVE.

GENTLEMEN.-I bave to thank you, and to request you will convey to the Inhabitants of Surat, who joined you in signing the Address which you presented to me, my thanks for the very gratifying torms in which you have there spoken of various acts of my administration, which more or less affect the ancient city of Surat and its inhabitants. I me able, on the occasion when I received your deputation at Parel, to state, but very imperfectly, how highly I appreciate the feeling which prompted you to address me on the eye of my departure from among you. There is no city in India which has been longer or intimately connected with the British Government than Surat; and there are few communities better able than your own to judge of the general effects of those which have, of late years, been adopted with view to restore to Surat some portion of the prosperity it enjoyed when it was the great emporium of foreign trade in Western India. But the best considered measures of Government and do but little without a wise and active administration of your Municipal affairs. I am glad to hear that, under the direction of your present able and energotic Collector, (Mr. T. C. Hope.,) this subject is likely to obtain its fair share of your attention; and I trust that, forgetting minor differences, all educated and influential inhabitants of Surat will co-operate heartily with him, in giving Surat such a Municipal administration = shall be worthy of her past glories, of her present importance, and of the position which she will, I trust at no distant period once more hold among the great commercial cities of India. I regret that pressure of public business quite prevented my being able before I left Bombay to send any formal reply to your Address. I must now bid you a kind farewell, and with my most sincere wishes that m prosperity may attend you, beg you to believe me, very faithfully yours.

To His Excellency

Sir Henry Bartle Edward Frere, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., GOVERNOR W. BOMBAY.

Ahmedabad, ?7th February 1867. }

REPLY TO MAN ABOVE.

GENTLEMEN,—The pressure of urgent public business prevented my sending a reply before I left Bombay to the Address which you were good enough to forward to by the hands of my worthy late colleague Mr. Premabhai Hemabhai, the Nagger-Sett of Ahmedabad.

I was greatly disappointed that it was out of my power to repeat, as I had boped to have done, my visit to your ancient city, so full of all that is most interesting as regards the past well as the present and the future. I look back to my visit to Ahmedabad in 1861 with the greater pleasure, because it not only enabled me to judge of the great progress made during the many years that had clapsed since I last saw your city, but also to judge of the great future which is in store for it, when, as, I hope, at no distant day, Ahmedabad shall be the centre of a system of railway extending northward towards Rajpootana and Hindustan, and south and west into the rich province of Kattiawar.

Ahmedahad was one of the first among the cities of Western India to possess a Municipal income and constitution of her mum. In the cause of education her citizens have always taken a lead, and the rapid progress of the last few years is an earnest, that the time is not far off when the ancient glories of the capital of Guzerat shall find a parallel in the revived prosperity of modern Ahmedabad.

assured I shall always feel a deep interest in the welfare of your city, and with my best wishes for your personal happiness and prosperity.

H. FRERE.

[London. December 1867.]

The Native Princes of Kattiawar having applied to the East India Association to arrange a public meeting for the presentation of an Address from them to Sir Henry Bartle Edward Frere, G. C. S. I., K. C. B., late Governor of Bombay, the large man in Willis's, King Street, St. James's, and engaged, where the interesting ceremony took place.

The Chair - occupied by the RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD LYVEDEN, President of the Association, who in opening the proceedings said ;--

SIR BARTLE FRERE,-I have been deputed . President of the East India Association, which has been formed for the purpose of promoting the interests of India, to present to you on this occasion an Address from the independent Princes of Kattiawar, acknowledging the eminent services you have rendered to India in the execution of your office of Governor of Bomboy. I believe it is now thirty-three or thirty-four years since you first entered the Indian service, and during the whole of that time your coreer has been marked by zeal and energy, by which you have risen to the high position which you now occupy. My first acquaintance with you commenced when you were filling the arduous office of Commissioner of Sind, during the period of the Indian Mutiny. In this garish and busy world the deeds of men who triumph by force often meet with the most general applause, but a man like you, who preserved the province you governed intact by a rule so strong and benevolent that rebellion dared not show its outrageous face, equally deserves the praise and thanks of mankind. Your conduct was cordially acknowledged by my colleagues at that time, and I ventured then to give expression to my sentiments in Parliament on your conduct. I - only repeat the sentiments ____ Others may have received higher honours, but you have the consciousness of having deserved them. After that, Sir, you were transferred to the Council of India, where you had the esteem of that great man, then Governor-General III India, the late Lord Canning, who never flinched in the hour of peril, and to whom we indebted, much as to any other person for the preservation of empire in India.

^{*} For information connected with Province, Vide Coverament No. 1856, New Series.

After that, you transferred | Government of Bombay, | in | government you distinguished yourself in a mount that rivalled or preceding governors. You devoted yourself in the improvement of municipal institutions in India, you headed for the promotion of charitable and educational undertakings, and supported everything that would tend ■ the true welfure of the people, and assist in bringing them into a position of dignity and rank which they had never before achieved. Others have talked of such work; theorists have maintained it we the right thing wide; but you did it. You have done than any one else to develop the system of Female Education in India, thereby acknowledging the great truth, that in proportion - nations become givilized and prosperous they will appreciate and defend the position of women-not by bestowing upon them the mere attention of the uge of chivalry, but by placing them in a schere in which they may foster a love for literature and the arts, and participate in every rational enjoyment. For that you are entitled to our thanks. And now, having occupied the position of some of our greatest men, of Mountstuart Elphinstone, of Lord Elphinstone, and of Sir George Clerk you are again introduced to the Corneil of India, to which your fresh knowledge of India will be of infinite use. I therefore have the greatest pleasure in presenting you this Address from the independent Princes of Kattinwar, who desire to compliment you on your conduct in that country. Their praise is not an pression of gratitude for favours to come, but for favours past. They desire ncknowledge that you have behaved to them in a manner to conciliate their esteem, and to gain their admiration, and not only theirs, but of all those of this country who know the value of your services.

Captain H. Barber, the Secretary of the East Iudia Association, then read the Address, which was m follows:---

To HIS EXCELLENCY

SIE HENRY BARTLE EDWARD FRURE, G. C. S. I., K. C. B. LONDON.

Your Excellency,—It was our intention before your departure from these shores to have presented you with an Address, but untoward circumstances which, perhaps, it would purpose to explain, prevented We trust, however, that, though late, this expression of our sentiments of our high respect and esteem for your Excellency will be graciously received. It is not necessary for us to trace your progress in life, from the day you put foot in Bombay as a writer in the Honourable East India Company's service to the day you left its shores as its Governor, for your Excellency's career is patent to all. Though we, the Chiefs of Kattiawar, have not enjoyed the advantages of your advice and labours . civil servant of the Government of India, - have the Chiefe and People of the Doccan, we have reason to congratulate ourselves that, notwithstanding the arduous and duties which devolved upon you ... Governor of Bombay, your Excellency never lost right of our and people's interests. It would have been nothing but natural that, when called to rule this vast Presidency, the of your first labours would have had your Excellency's first regards; but it was not so. If your efforts were untiring for the extension of works of public utility in the Southern Maratha Country, or any other part of the vast dominions that were entrusted to your rule, the advantages to be derived from such works have been muntiringly urged upon us me we trust me have not been unmindful of the great interest evinced by your Excellency our and our people's welfare. The promotion of the Education, too, has occupied much of your Excellency's time and earnest attention. The fruits of your Excellency's philanthropic exertions wisible everywhere throughout this Presidency; and Kattiawar, where once no attention was paid to the subject is now, me have meet to believe, not behindhand with other districts in the establishment and maintenance of schools, where its man and daughters may have not only a vernacular but a sound English education... Time would to tell of the various other in which your Excellency's rule has been a blessing to this country. While - feel grateful - your Excellency for your generous efforts to maintain and elevate position in this empire, pray the Almighty may long spare your useful life, and grant you and strength to enable you to prosecute your benevolent designs for India. With our best wishes for your Excellency, and respective members of your family, remain your Excellency's friende.

GETTRAL C. F. mail, after the and eloquent manner in his Lordship had alluded the public and of Sir Bartle Frere on sion like this, when Princes had combined I do him honour, an humble individual like himself naturally felt embarramed in offering his testimony the character of the gentleman in whose honour they were assembled that day. But he looked upon it that greatness consisted in the estimation in which the acts of a man were held by his contemporaries. Therefore the opinion of m humble individual like bimself might be accepted by Sir Bartle Frere, though not valued in the same degree as that of princes. The not one of a civil servant of the Indian Government at this day and one which a man could easily get himself classified among the great man of India. In former days there was a wider will than existed present. There were political relations with independent territories; there were nexations, new territories acquired by the East India Company, which called for great administrative and political ability on the part of the civil aervants. In the present day such was not the case. The daily duties of the civil vants in India were - confined by the rules and regulations of the various departments to which they belonged, that it was almost impossible for any man a get further in the estimation of those in authority than to be regarded m s diligent collector or magistrate, or a conscientions, prinstaking judge. It had, however, been left . Sir Bartle Frere, under those circumstances, to achieve greatness with an departing from the well-beaten track of official life, and by the exhibition of all those talents and characteristics which were the agents and attributes of greatness. He could testify. from personal observation, that Sir Bartle Frere was held in love and esteem by every member of the Bombay Army, and was regarded by all who knew him as the kind and steady friend of the military service.

Mr. PRAGEI BRIMEI, Agent of the Kattiawar Princes, said:-

As the only native of Kattiawar now present in Fingland, I feel more than ordinary interest in the present occasion, when we have met here to present in Address in behalf of the Princes of Kattiawar to Sir Bertle Frere, as a grateful recognition of the benefits they have received during his administration. Before my departure for this country in April I had been for several years connected with the Political Agency in Province, and from what knowledge and experience I have gained changes and reform during the regime of the present Political Agent, Colonel Keatinge, I am confidently state that the selection of such interesting officer to the post of political agent in Kattiawar by Sir Bartle Frere was a great boon conferred on the Province, reflecting great Sir Bartle Frere for having placed the right in the right place.

Address is an edizinish that the policy recently inaugurated in ! -namely, that of "Reform," under Sir Burtle Frere's auspices is a policy usentially beneficial both to the Princes and to their subjects. It is from this demonstration of their feelings, exhibited, I ---precedented manner, that the fruits of the system and beginning to riper. The Princes have shown that they are fully capable of appreciating ever is well intended for them. The governor who sees a country thoroughly given up to conservation-that won't move on, that was many behind its neighbours-who coursecously determines that its youth shall not grow up as their ancestors, and who sends, to earry out the determination, a competent officer, lives challes as we say in Kattiawar , that is, ever fresh in the memory of those who are receiving and benefits of his encouragement. The reform in almost every department, enernetically carried was by the political agent and other officers, was carefully watched and criticised; at first looked on doubtfully, but afterwards interest, and finally approved by the principal States. In almost every instance in which a chief has shown himself anxious to follow the good example set, he has found himself rewarded in the welfare of his subjects. by the approbation of our gracious Sovereign. It is in . Frere's reign that two Chiefs of Kattiawar have obtained the Star of India. One cannot emit to mention the great spur that has been given to Education, The people of Kattiawar u few years ago dreaded this; they now actually willingly send not only their sons, but their daughters to schools in the principal towns. The importance of this is patent to all, and is full of promise for the future well-being of the Province.

been asked express his sentiments on this occasion. In the deserved well of both England and India—of England, because in had done his duty towards her; of India, because he had been to her in kind, wise, beneficent, and able ruler. When we reflected how many were the complex circumstances which statesmen had to consider in the government of a country like India—when we knew there was an aristocracy to be maintained and raised to a sense of its duty, and a people, degraded by long tradition, to be also and into enlightenment and presperity—when we knew there were superstitions of long shiftiding to be done away with, and a want of resolution and a system of development to be met, the difficulty of government was apparent; and Sir Bartle Frere's great trait had been ability | grass and grapple with it. In his future career—he am not know and am might have the satisfaction of seeing Governor-General-India would no doubt still continue a receive the and of could only judge of England by the representatives and out, and 66 long as we send out persons like Elphinstone Frere, have a cause as ashamed of performing her duty towards and novulations of India. long in India and Secretaries of like Northcota, Stanley, Cranborne, and Wood, wlong would India w be perfectly with British rule, because in men we were inatice combined firmness and goodness of character. administration, with all its shortcomings, was of nation might well be proud, and its Indian administration glorious chapter in the history of mankind.

had been passed on Sir Bartle Frere, but none of the speakers who gone before had said a word as to his private character. It is good fortune to have known Sir Bartle Frere almost from the she first landed in Bombay, and from that day to this blessed they had their acquaintance, opening into friendship. He might member of the Civil Service, whether a Commissioner of Sind, whether as Member of the Governor-General's Council, or Governor of Bombay, he can the man Bartle Frere, a gentleman every inch of him. The subject of female education the one which the engaged his own attention. It most the quantity that they wanted, the quality, the conducted on the English system; and after they conducted in establishing the institution to English Governesses employed, and they awad the the encouragement given them by Bartle Frere.

I thank you, my Lord, both personally and in your President of the India Association, for the manner in the you have carried out India Address, and I beg you will convey expression of my acknowledgments for the great honour they and you have this day done me.

It is more grateful to me from being so totally unexpected, for till a very few days ago I had not the alightest application of the kind was in store for me.

In whatever form it had come I have greatly expression of the goodwill of Princes of hecause, from very circumstance of my having personally little known to most of them, until I charged the government of the Presidency of Bombay, I that they have actuated by motive of individual partiality, and that my enly to the honour they have done is my having honestly endeavoured to carry out what has been, for many years past, declared policy of England with regard to India.

The many of the independent influential Princes of appreciate the good intentions of the Government and people in England towards them, is to me a permanent and people in the permanent than the personal gratification which I have derived from their Address, and from the very flattering manner in it has been presented to me.

And, my Lord, in this point of view, I cannot but regard the present occasion - one of - temporary or merely personal import-It is true that Kattiawar is only and of the seven great provinces which make up the Presidency of Bombay. It in many respects it may be regarded an almost am epitome of man whole Indian empire. It is two-thirds the size of Ireland, and but small portion is British territory; the greater part of the province divided among many princes and chieftains, under the general control of a British political officer, but in the less independent, twelve of them exercising powers of kie and death, and other attributes of real sovereignty. Some of these Chiefs, of Hindù and Rajpoot descent, and show pedigrees, apparently well authenticsted, running back further than any reigning house in Europe. Many of prove, in our Courts of Law, that they had ruled. where they now rule, in the days of the early Crumders. represent families which powerand on this coast when their alliance was sought by the and generals of the early Turkish empire-when the sent his fleets from Bessers to repel the earliest Portuguese invasion of India. There me find, on the coast of Kattiawar, the Portuguese and holding their ancient settlement of Diu, which they sallantly defended, and the Mahomedan prince still ruling where his ancestors ruled when they attacked the Christian fortress, while the public peace is preserved by the distant Government of the Queen of England. I know of no variety of landed tenure, in the whole civilized world, of which I could not produce examples from among the ancient proprietors of Kattiawar. The races and find in that province are equally varied. There are to be man representatives of almost every tribe in India, and of every form of Indian belief. The aborigines, whose ancestors inhabited country when the Brahmins themselves invading race, the polished and humane traders who lineally represent that Buddhist religion of which the records are yet to be found graven on the rocks of of the Kattiawar hill-forts, and who look upon the Christian and the Jew, the Mahomedan and the Parsi, who now frequent their coasts. ___ followers of comparatively modern creeds | old arts of sculpture and architecture, of metal work and jewellery, of writing and illumination, of weaving and wood-carving, still live there, the artists following am same processes whereby their ancestors, in the same cities, wrought for the traders of Byzantium, and of early Venice and Genoa. We, in England, are apt to look on the people of India | less proficient in the | of than of peace. But these people of Kattiawar are far from being an unwarlike race; are are the profession in highest repute next to the macerdotal office; in me part of India do more of the population habitually carry arms, and in none they ready to appeal to their arbitrament.

Since I tast had the honour of seeing you, my Lord, here London, my years ago, I have myself been eye-witness of operations on the Kattiawar coast, in the amount of which insurgents, who had occupied a mass of the province, held insurgents against a considerable force of British troops, on occasion successfully resisted a gallant British regiment which attempted incautiously to carry by the old temple which the insurgents had fortified themselves. The times I speak of were exceptional: but what, my Lord, we have the military with which, for sixty years, this considerable province has been kept in a sum of general peace and progressive improvement?

As well as I may gather from the latest returns, I believe that the whole European force, employed in Kattiawar at this moment, consists of a detail of British artillery with four guns, and about thirty English gentlemen, employed mofficers in various positions of civil and military command. I of that, as the last resort, the power of Her Majesty's Government in Kattiswar rests on the great garrisons of India and of England, but there is no other garrison of European troops within many days' march of the province, and peace is habitually kept, m it has been maintained for fifty = sixty years past, among all these ancient, proud, and martial states, with no other military force of the paramount power than - regiment - two of sepoys, and a couple of squadrons of native cavalry, and a single battery, or less, of European artillery. I doubt whether the English military on military duty in Kattiawar at this present moment number than twenty men, and there may be ten or a dozen more employed on civil and political duties, under Colonel II H. Keatinge, the Political Agent, who rules the province with proconsular authority.

spectacle of slarge and populous province kept in order by seem handful of English gentlemen, and severy small force to English soldiers and disciplined sepoys, is, so you, my Lord, know, so novel nor an unusual seem in India, and it well worth while to weigh carefully the causes which have made this possible; for smoment's reflection will convince us that, whatever the cause may be, it is the true secret of seem supremacy in India, and the only condition on which seem long hold it—for we all know that distant country, however powerful or populous, can bear the permanent drain necessary to hold such a possession as India by force of seem.

believe, my Lord, the secret will be found to nothing else scrupulous regard which the British Government in India habitually prescriptive rights and interests of its subjects, and enruest desire which actuates the proceedings of that Government to protect every one of its subjects, whatever his rank, the higher as well as the lower orders, in the peaceful possession of his ancestral rights. We may not have always been successful, or even consistent in carrying out this policy; but desire to do so has, m your Lordship knows, been before

In Kattiawar have been greatly aided by the existence of large, powerful, and ancient middle and upper class, of which the Chiefs, who signed these addresses, we among the principal leaders; and I believe that this element in the body politic, when directed, as it is now by so judicious, as kindly, and able a representative of the British Government as Colonel Keatings, will be found of the greatest value in promoting the work of permanent improvement.

Colonel Keatinge has acted on the maxims which, in theory. least, is never denied by an Indian native prince,-that the true interests of the rulers and the ruled identical: that you cannot infringe on the ancient customary rights of the chief, without risking the rights of the smallest freeholders on his estate, and that you cannot protect the real interests of the latter class, without strengthening the resources and the position of their feudal supeziors. When I paid a short visit to the province this time last year, I found that every me of the Chiefs I met me proud to show me, m to tell me of more work of material improvement. Most of them had roads; some, an the man coast, had piers; and many had ordered out valuable machinery from England for pumping water for irrigation, and for cleaning and spinning cotton; above they had m far forgotten their hereditary enmities and jealousies, = combine together for the construction of a railroad throughout the province, which only needs the co-operation of the Enlish Government, to link it me to one of those great trunk-lines. ich the genius of Lord Dalhousie bequeathed to India, and ch the Kattiawar line will become important feeder.

y of the Chiefs have taken the cause of education seriously in ad, and have adopted practical measures to promote mechanical, well ordinary education. Three of the principal found had not only courts of justice, more gular and better paid than were known in former years, but drawn up and printed, for their guidance, rules of procedure, and civil and criminal codes, abridged and adapted to local wants customs from the more elaborate Codes in in British territory.

In all this, my Lord, there is, as you know, nothing absolutely to Indian system. Colonel Keatinge, has advised in directed the Chiefs with admirable tact and prudence; but the spirit in which he has acted is the many which actuated many of predecessors, when of whom personally known to your Lordship; and others who have left a name behind them public benefactors in the province, are, at this moment, I believe, members of your Association. In giving Colonel Keatinge, all the support in my power, in furtherance of his good work, I have done and no less than my predecessors, to some of whom you have injustly and feelingly referred as models of Indian statesmen.

And what has been the result of this policy?

These addresses are one proof that the Chiefs are not insensible to the spirit in which I and my predecessors, have acted; but, my Lord, I believe that a knowledge of what our intentions are, and m conviction that the policy we have followed is only m part of the permanent policy of England towards India, will produce much more lasting results than personal good feeling. Your Lordship lately heard Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India state, in alluding to the spirit in which the intelligence of the Abyssinian expedition was received in India, that was of the Princes of Western India had come forward with spontaneous some of service and assistance to Her Majesty, in this great enterprise; and you will have been pleased to recognise that two of the three named by Sir Stafford Northcote, princes of Kattiawho have signed this Address. I think, my Lord, that this gives ground for believing the feeling of these Princes towards our Government is no suffen acquiescence in our rule, and hoping the time is not distant when they may feel that they are themselves indeed an integral, vital, and essential part of the constitution of Indian empire.

Finally, my Lord, I beg to express the gratification with which I receive addresses your hands, not only account of the past, as I recall the time when honour to under you while President of the Board of Control you directed the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards India, but in your character as President of this Association. It take the Association has undertaken is one, I believe, of the greatest national importance. It may seem a comparatively easy matter, where your range of subjects is great, to promote, as you undertake to do, the interests and welfare of India generally, it is a task of a little difficulty and delicacy to keep that other part of your programme, which binds the Society abstain from all advocacy of purely personal and local grievances, and from interfering in all questions which capable of judicial solution.

I believe much may be done by the Association of conveying information to English public men. Statesmen in England are most anxious to be thoroughly well-informed Indian subjects, but we, of India, have generally an unhappy tendency to treat Indian subjects, so technically make them distasteful to an English audience; and, I believe, English public men may do minumense service to their Indian muciates if colleagues and auditors they make induce to make Indian audjects intelligible to educated Englishmen.

the Association has a far higher purpose than the collection and diffusion of information.

Here, in Europe, nothing is more striking than the tendency change, which is everywhere visible around Even placed optimist in London perpetually reminded that live of revolutions. Every great social and political problem is, so to speak, up by the roots, and which our planted, and under the shade of which our fathers will in peace, has often to be re-planted and re-watered, prunand examined, before the restless children of this generation are content with it.

But rapid are the changes in Europe, they are much sudden in India. Everything is on a vast scale, and the tens of millions of intelligent, industrious, and commercial people of India have had comparatively but little political education to prepare them for these changes. They have, it is true, in many parts learnt, by centuries of misrule and bloodshed, the blessing of a settled, well-intentioned government, even though it be government of strangers. But the generation which saw armies march, and cities blaze, which hailed the scarlet uniforms of England the harbingers of peace and good order, is rapidly passing away, and with it must also depart the personal recollections of those who regarded the pale-faced children of the North as a sort of incarnation of justice, as well as of strength—who looked on the English "Sahib," not only as a kind of fate, which could not be resisted, but as something divine, which could do wrong.

We must govern India henceforth, all the world must be governed, by the divine right of good government; and this task. which is not easy here, in England, is still more difficult in India, where all the elements of change are more numerous and much potent than in Europe. India has not, like this Western world, undergone long centuries of preparation for imprevement. It is me though all that conduces to change England, our free laws, our free press, our railways, our steamengines, and above all me religion and the spirit of free and impartial inquiry which it demands, had been introduced, not gradually and ripening by slow degrees from generation to generation, but suddenly, and as if the revolutions which have been accomplished during the past three centuries in England had been concentrated in the first fifty years of English rule in India. I believe, Sir, that those who have passed their lives in India, who rule the destinies of England, could hardly do a better work for both England and India than by combining together discuss great problems of Indian statemenship before they force themselves upon me matters which imperatively demand immediate solution. And it is in this point of view that I recognise the work your Association has in hand mone of imperial importance. I look on the addresses you have been kind enough convey to me, as fresh evidence of the reasonable desire of the provinces of India, to take no inactive share in the great career of British empire; and I regard the channel through which those addresses have been presented, as one of the most which, by the blessing of the Almighty, may assist India and England to achieve successfully the great work which Providence has before me

III SPEECHES AT PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENTS.

MM Zyculla Club.

[Bombay, February 1867.]

-000-

A Farewell Entertainment we given to His Excellency SirHenry Bartle Edward Frere, by the Members of the above Club.

The Chair was taken by Andrew Richard Scoble, Esq., President of the Committee of the Club.

THE CHAIRMAN, in proposing we won toast, said :-

Gentlemen,-I call upon you m drink to Her Majesty me Queen. I toast which, in all assemblies of Englishmen, needs no aloguence the part of its proposer to commend it those whom it is proposed. Her Majesty the Queen holds too deep and firm a position in the hearts of her subjects to require that any public enumeration of the virtues by which she has endeared herself to us all should be made upon any occasion; and the only reason why I would do than almost formally propose that toast to you is this, that on a recent occasion in England a voice from Bombay—but which Bombay disclaims—was heard pass reflections upon the present occupant of the British Throne. The greatpopular leader of present times—I will not call him the greatest demagogue-rose up and repudiated the insinuation; and the whole assembly, belonging to a class held to be unrepresented by a of aristocratic tyranny. returned the charge which had been made by Mr. Ayrton, by singing God save the Queen." I believe, therefore, that whatever may be the political feeling in England, there is this feeling at all events in the breasts of all Englishmen,-a feeling of loyal attachment to the throne and to pres. "r occupant. - Long may Her Majesty remain on that throns-as | Poet Laurente expresses it,

> "Broad based upon her people's will And compassed by the inviolate seas."

CHAIRMAN, in proposing the next toast,:-

Gentlemen,—I have call upon you to drink the of Royal Family of England. That is a which, like the one preceded it, needs no commendation. The Prince of Wales has his place at once in the first rank of British gentlemen, partaking their and showing himself at all foreign was a worthy representative of the British Crown. It is wife is the darling of the English nation; and the other members of the Royal Family, in the positions in which they are placed, have shown themselves worthy of the great antion to which they belong.

The CHAIRMAN, in giving the toast of the evening, said :-

Gentlemen,-- I won you to fill your glasses the toast which I am now about to propose, and believe me it with no affectation that I say I sincerely wish that the pleasing duty which I was have a perform to be performed by some one competent to do justice it than I am. Much, Gentlemen, as I appreciate the duty which as Chairman of this Club have to-night 🔳 discharge, I feel that my feeble powers are insufficient 📟 do justice to the toast which I have to propose; and I must beg you, will I must beg honoured Guest, to hear with me in any deficiency of of which I may be found guilty. Apart, too, from the disqualifications which I possess in other respects I feel that to-night I shall have considerable difficulty in anaking my voice heard throughout this room. But I take it, Gentlemen, that we are here to-night, so much to effect a political demonstration—not so much to express the feeling that we entertain with regard to the character of the administration of the Governor who about to leave us-as here, an assemblage of the gentlemen of Bombay, anxious to do honour to, and testify their heartfelt regard and respect for, the gentleman who during the last five years has been = the head of society in this Presidency. It is not for property on this occasion and in his presence to refer to the particular features of Sir Bartle Frere's government in to the merits of his administration. That has been done in other places and by abler hands. We have paid our tribute to him in the localities in which it is most fitting that that tribute should be paid. But here to-night we meet, ... I take it, to pay tribute of heartfelt respect to the personal cellencies and the high individual character of our distinguished Guest. And I trust that I may be permitted while in this topic to refer briefly to what has always struck me in the leading characteristic of Sir Burtle Frere's private and public character. It has been said in unother place, and in a very eloquent oration, that Sir Bartle Frere might be almost taken | belong to a see of statesmen now well-nigh extinct. I am disposed to accept definition, for I prefer believe that the high qualities of which Excellency given proof are qualities which as the world are more an more recognised as the qualities of real that | highminded courtesy-a chivalrous abnegation of self-s sincere regard in the public interest-a genuine appreciation . highqualities of humanity—are virtues becoming amongst amongst And it is because he living representative of virtues as that that to-night to do honour. Sir Bartle Frere. I would prefer to say that in our Governor who is about leave possess, not a representative of departed statesmanship, but rather alization pourtrayed by the Poet Laureate when he pointed to who in discharge of their duties to the public "Would love the gleams of light that broke From either side, nor veil their eyes; But if some drendful need should rise, Would strike, and firmly, and one stroke."

I take it that that is what we may regard muthe characteristic of modern statesmanship,—a class of ____ blinded by no inveterate prejudices; open __ honest impression, ready to listen, ready to consider, but who, when the moment for action arrives, are not afraid to take a decisive And it is Gentlemen, this combination of an individual energy of character with a conscientious regard for the opinions of other men, and with a readiness to receive impressions from them without making at the same time timid concessions to opinions opposed to wown, will take it has been the leading characteristic of Sir Bartle Frere's since its commencement. From time when he landed in Bombay, as a young civilian, thirty-three years ago-a longer time than some of us can look back upon in the lives ;-since landed here thirty-three years ____ (and in the history of India ____ a very long period,) up to the present time, - find that he has been called upon = fill positions which require from him the highest qualities, and he has never proved unequal to any one of those positions. The introduction of the Revenue Survey Settlement into wild country was slight devolve upon a young recently arrived from old country England; but me find that in every part of this Presidency where Sir Bartle Frere laboured in those early days his meet is still held in honour and he remembered by the agricultural population of the country. Afterwards, in Sattara, he had a most difficult task m perform; and how he performed it appears on the records of the Government of this country. In Sind placed in equally difficult position; and he discharged his there is a manner that man for the not only the gratitude of India thanks of British Legislature. Afterwards, in Calcutta, acrvices he rendered not only - this country, but to his - land and to humanity in general, to be written and remembered only when the full history of these troublous times and come before the public. Just Gentle-I would venture to say that in all these epochs of his career the great Sir Bartle Frere's character which I walleded been that which has stood and his country assets stead; for be it borne in mind that, although in the various duties which he was been upon a perform he has necessarily been brought into contact with conflicting interests and with opinions adverse to his own,—and although in conflict he has shown himself to be tenscious of his opinion while considerate and courteous to those who differed from him, yet I would venture to say he has never during the whole of his career made a single enemy.

And I take the reason of it to be this. Gentlemen, that to his courtesy in conflict he has always added the utmost moderation in victory. At the time when Sir Bartle Frere was the right hand man of Lord Canning in Calcutta, this country was passing through a stage of existence unparalleled, I may say, in the history of any land. There was a just, or at all events an excusuable chamour, on the side; and there was on the other side population overcome by military prowess and guilty of a great wrong. And what is the rourse that the ludian Government—as I would venture to say, very much by the influence I Sir Bartle Figre-then adopted? It was not a policy of mocking triumph-it was not a policy of the rejoicing of the strong over the weak-but it as a policy which exemplified the noblest attributes of our nature and gave - England by adopting it proudest glory which she has attained. Gentlemen, I fear that in alluding this to the political of Sir Bartle Frere, I may be straying from the proper objects of an assembly like this; but I feel that to be silent on this occasion in regard to those features in our honoured Guest's career would be to omit what is really his highest claim for renown. At the time I would almost prefer on this occasion to refer to the influence which Sir Bartle Frere has exercised upon the society of Bombay. And coming to this point it is impossible to forbear to mention the part taken by Lady Frere-who has given a grace to the hospitality of Parel which no bachelor Governor could ever hope to attain. By her presence, aided by the co-operation of His Excellency, a stimulus has been given to Bombay society, which much wanted, and of which I hope will never to reap benefit. And, r oreover, I think that-passing from the more ordinary topics which suggest themselves on an occasion like this-we may recogthat Sir Bartle Frere throughout his has exemplified if those qualities which a civilian ought to passess. He has been good on homeback, good as a shot, and possessed of all the accomplishments which into the character of an English gentleman. I may mention here what is probably known to many—that me energy character which has always distinguished Frere him of the pioneers Route. I believe if not the first individual who came by the way of Egypt and the Red Sea, he was the and civilian who ever joined his appointment by that route; and I think I am not wrong saying that withe period of his first arrival in Bomboy, for from presenting the appearance of a distinguished member of the Civil Service, he rather looked like a representative of a class which is known now by the name of "loafer." Gentlemen, if such an appearance is a common one with the great pioneers of civilization-those whose experiences confer such inestimable benefits upon humanity-1 and only say they are not the sort of persons with whom I would like to walk arm in arm down Regent Street. And I believe that an the occasion of Sir Bartle Frere's first arrival in this country he man so disfigured by the difficulties and dangers which he had experienced in coming mann the Desert, and then down the Red Sea, and afterwards in a buccalow from Mocha to Bombay, that even his brother could not recognise him. Now, Gentlemen, I am content to take that as a foretaste of what Sir Bartle Frere was afterwards to do. The dangers and difficulties of that route thirty-three years ago were more serious than any of the gentlemen who have arrived in India by the comfortable transit afforded by the P. and O. Co. can easily appreciate, but they must such as to deter Sir Bartle from undertaking the voyage; and when arriving at Suez he did not find the ship which he had pected to join, he was not deterred from going down the Red Sea in an open boat as far . Mocha, and sailing thence Bombay in a buggalow. Now, requires great energy and force of character, which I think meminent characteristics of Sir Bartle Frere, and which have stood him in good ever since the time which refer. Gentlemen, will not detain you longer. I propose that we drink in the health of Size Barria Franc, with three times three.

SIR BARTLE FREDE, in responding to the toast, said:---

Mr. Scoblerand Gentlemen,—I have often during the last few weeks found and difficulty to express in an adequate manner my feelings hearing of the regret felt the time of my departure from this country drew near, but a safely say that I feel no such difficulty on this occasion. I believe that the way in which Mr. Scoble has proposed my health and the manner in which you have received the toast would draw manner acknowledgments heart of stone. But under any circumstances, Gentlemen, that it is probably the last time that I shall have the pleasure of dining in this Club would fill me with many solemn.

recollections, and also with many pleasant recollections of the days are past. My recallection should go back to a time very near to that which Mr. Scoble has escribed m graphically, will should remember the day when, a very few days after my arrival in Bombay, I first entered this Club-which we then a very small building indeed, comprised I think within the walls of what present your newspaper room, and having no eleeping rooms, nor any thing beyond a very moderate billiard room in which ourselves. From that day to this-on many occasions before I came here - Governor-I met habitually in this Club all that most valuable among the European population of Bombay: and I feel this evening that it is a pleasure which no other could surpass, to know that in leaving Bombay I have your sympathy and your regret. It is a peculiar pleasure, Gentlemen, to those who have served in this country, to feel that the Natives of this country do not regard them altogether as an evil genius sent to persecute them; -and the regret which has been expressed by many of my native friends, and by many among the natives who know me only by name, sinks very deep into my heart. There is a great pleasure also, in knowing that those who hold the threads of this great empire of India do not consider that in my conduct here I have betrayed the trust reposed in me; and I can eafely say that to me personally there is no gratification equal to that of knowing the class to which I myself belong—that those with whom I have laboured, with whom I have risen, and who we the beat judges of my conduct, willing to say that I have not disgraced their order. Gentlemen, it has always struck me that in England we are in the habit of doing very scant justice to institutions like this. We have got into the habit of regarding them mere in social organisation, but I have often thought they take a very important place in the political organization of England and are a valuable mount of preparing Englishmen for political life which is more less the part of every one of us. first place me acquire in those clubs a complete deference verdict of the majority-which is of itself a great thing. We are trained also to a habitual deference to the government of the best and wiscot among us, whom we have selected to rale over, regard minority: and help thinking it is magrest to this feeling-which plays so important a part in club organisation and club habits—that we owe that teleration to which your Chairman alluded in speaking of the way in which we the Natives of this country. In all party contests, political otherwise, there is mercat disposition on the part of the majority, or those who get the victory, to treat with scant consideration those whom they have triumphed; but it is very different, you know, in Clubs, for when a question is settled, there great toleration always shown to the minority, and the object of committee of a good Club is always to make up differences which have been caused by a Club quarrel. Now, Gentlemen, I do not think this is m unimportant matter when many of countrymen and out to rule over a nation, an I may say an assemblage of nations, in India. But, Gentlemen, whatever may be the claims of a Club in England on the gratitude of the community, I think there are very few who will not recognize far greater claims here in Bombay, where this institution has been to so many of our younger brethren a home and wery happy home. We know that in England there is often a choice between a home and a club; but here, where many of us have no home of owe a double debt of gratitude to the Club. And, Gentlemen, I have always thought that this institution afforded to me so many of the advantages of Club life at home, in establishing a standard of judgment upon all social questions, and passing m free and unbisesed verdict upon all those questions, and in affording a home to our younger brethren and keeping them generally wery good order-that it deserved the gratitude of all who look to the character of Englishmen in this country - of paramount importance to the character of English Government. And I have viewed with satisfaction the growth of such institutions-especially of infant - Poons where I had lately the pleasure being entertained—as a good sign of the advancement of society Bombay. Gentlemen, I feel it very to in any way to what your Chairman has said regarding me personal! I feel we some apology to community for me baving appeared among them in the he has described, but I have been called to the bar I we bound to confess that he has given a true account of it. The only extenuating circumstance I can urge is. that after a long voyage down the Issue Sea, cooking for ourselves and mending our own clothes, -without any awning over us, and far away from the Indian " washerwomen "---we could hardly avoid becoming rather disreputable looking; and I shall forget the of doubt with which the respected head partner of the excellent house of Forbes and Co. looked at us, when, without any previous notice of our arrival, we presented ourselves before him with our latters of introduction. The kindness and hospitality, however, with which we were entertained when it was found that indeed good men and true, fully made up for the embarragement - experienced at arrival. I have always felt, too, that what wont through at that time a good foundation for the respect I have always entertained for that excellent corporation the P. and O. Co., to which we owe so much-and the gratitude = felt for what we then experienced in the shape of a kind welcome from Bombay-the European community of which was then very small -has been more than justified by what I have since experienced. Gentlemen, I have only one more remark which I would beg you to bear in mind,—that whatever may have been my personal success as a Governor in this Presidency, I owe it entirely to the operation of those man with whom I have come in contact. I conscientiously confirm what your Chairman has said, that I never felt the slightest difficulty in obtaining their sympathy and support in endeavouring to carry out anything which was required for the good of the country,-that, whether it me a popular or unpopular measure. I could always find many around who could fully enter into any duty which I felt pressing upon myself, and who actuated by the same spirit, whether it good bad, which induced to elaborate any particular Whatever I have done, Gentlemen, has been done with the cordial assistance, not only of those who were deputed to such duty in the service of Government, but of me community alarge. And abould very ill discharge the debt of gratitude I owe - this community if I did not record the high which I of the aid I have always received from those outside the services who have co-operated with we every occasion which their poperation could be desired. And foremost among them, Geutlemen, was your Chairman. I will detain you no longer than to thank you once more for the kindness with which you have drunk my health, and to assure you that the esteem of the gentlemen of Bombay as represented in this Club will be one of the happiest recollections which I shall carry with me after thirty-three years' service in this country.

THE HON'BLE L. H. BAYLEY, THE ADVOCATE GENERAL, proposed was toast, which was the health of our brave defenders,- The Army the Navy. This - toast which was invariably received by Englishmen in all parts of the world with enthusia-m; but in India, where - so much depended upon the army for our existence, there were special reasons for honouring the toast. There we no doubt that we lived in troublous times; and there were elements at work on the continent of Europe whose results it was quite impossible to foresee. The Army was represented on occasion by his friend, Brigadicr-General Tapp-who had come three hundred miles, notwithstanding his forty years' residence in India, for purpose of being present. They had to regiet, however, the absence of Chief of the Bombay Army (who had been prevented by the death of a relative from attending.) and he would venture a say that - General who had been at the head of the Bombay Army was more entitled to the love of the officers, and even of the common soldiers, than the present General, Sir Robert Napier. The Navy of India had been so frequently described and its prowess so often the subject of remark that | unnecessary occupy the time of the company by speaking of it. They could not but feel gratified, however, that such a distinguished officer as Admiral Sir Henry Keppel was on his way to join the Indian and squadron. In concluding, the Hon'ble Gentleman said he would call upon Brigndier-General Tapp to respond for the Army, and Commodore Hillyar respond for the Navy.

Mr. Chairman and Genthemen,—It is a very sad thing, you admit, for an old officer to confess that he has been taken by surprise. I can only easure you that it was not my fault, for no one was a enough to me that I ought to prepare a speech. I was only when a came here that I was to be called upon, but I am sure you would something asy.

I am sorry to say I was elequent, and I am afraid shall be.

I have a great deal of feeling, and I feel very much the honourable position in which you have placed me. You know the Army, Gentlemen, and what they have been, something in reference to that. I think a great many of something either; so hope they are same and believe they so the same. They are resting in times of peace, but they so ready when called upon, and what they will be I think you know just as much as I do. And I feel perfectly confident that you all know that should our beloved Queen and so country call for them they we ready for anything that may come to pass. I begleave, Gentlemen, we you my most sincere thanks for the honour you have done

COMMODORB HILLYAR (of H. M's. S.S. Octoris) said ;-

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,—After the able speech that has from my honourable friend in my right, it is very difficult for me to return thanks or follow him up in the same style. Sailors are not orators, and I think hereity is the soul of wit. So I shall content myself with expressing my acknowledgments in the name of the Navy and myself for the Lonour you have done us in drinking our healths. I think there is one toost which we have forgotten, and that is "The Ladies." We sailors always make it the first toost. I hope we shall not be backward or found wanting whenever our services are required any time.

THE HON'REE Mr. BARROW HELBERT FILES, in proposing the next said :---

Gentlemen,—I rise to do the best in my power to do away with the moreoned which has been cast upon un by the gallant Commodere. Though I am moreoned to undertake the mighty task of proposing the health of the Ladies, yet I am deputed to propose to you the health of the very distinguished Lady. In doing so I feel not the slightest amount of diffidence, because, however feeble my powers of cratery may be, this toust is one which needs no more said but stands on more merits without help or assistant from the eloquence of any speaker. I more healtation, however, what I more say this occasion, for I am to some tongue-tied.

Though I have been desired to propose to you the health of my very distinguished Lady. In doing the stands on the support of the council Chamber or betraying official secreey, for my connection with affairs of State; but I fear lest I have be treading difficult and dangerous ground, and and descanting upon and and been entrusted to me. I should intruding upon the sanctity of private life. But for this fear, Gentlemen, I should have been able, perhaps, trace how the civilising power of I ady Frere had operated upon loafer m graphically described to you by the Chairman. But as it is me permitted me to do this, I may at least say that, Lowever much may miss Sir Bortle Frere in all the walks of public life, Lowever much we may miss him in connection with public works, in connection with education, and connection with the revenue or foreign departments of Government, in none shall we miss him more than we shall miss Lady Frere and her home. Gentlemen, when she has lett us, with the regrets which we shall feel ... her departure will be mingled many pleasing, very pleasing, reminiscences of the many happy hours which we have passed in her society and under her quantices, and there are many of us here who will long tomember the re-unions of timesh Khind or Parel . Malabar Point. But it is not only those who have been admitted to the mugic circle of Government House festivities that will cherish her memory, for, whenever among at the lower chastes kind words were needed, kind words in manus fell from her, and where-ever good deeds were wanted, good deeds and kind actions were always freely given. Amongst many, therefore, outside these walls, outside the circle of what is colled seriety, her name will be remembered with mutitude and love. I am only the representative of those assembled here to-night, and those assembled here are only the representatives of a larger growd who will always remember hady livers with feelings of regret for her departure. I am was all of you will join with an in wishing I ady Frere and her family a prosperous voyage bome and a joyful meeting with their friends in England, and long life and unulloyed happiness. It is, Gentlemen, to give pression to this feeling that I am now asking you to join with me in drinking with I the honours to the Health of Lady Frere.

Sin Bartle Frene asked the company to bear with him for a few moments while he endeavoured to express on Lady Frere's behalf her very cordial thanks for the honour they had done her in drinking her health. He could assure them that Lady Frere had very feeling for everything connected with this great Empire. She was, as they knew, the daughter and the grand-daughter of a soldier, and among her near relations she numbered an usual proportion of those who served in the military and naval vices of her country. She was herself acquainted with feeling gentlemen who sat that table, and have participate in the feelings of those who laboured for the advancement of the Indian Empire. And he (His Excellency) could make them that in all that he and Lady Frere had gone through together during make long time in this country it had been to him movery great assistance and support to feel that, whatever political or other storms might rage outside, there was always at home—whether in the Deccan Sind, at Parel make Malabar Point—one who would make the guests of the house as much at home mapossible, not from any feeling of cold official duty, but from maincere wish to do by them hostess should do by her guests. She would carry with her many recollections of pleasant days passed in India, and not m few of them passed in Bombay and in that very room; and he could say with the utmost confidence that she would carry to her own country a very grateful recollection of this last tribute of the kindly feeling and regard of the gentlemen of Bombay.

THE HON'DLE SIE JOSEPH ARROUGH said :---

I have much pleasure in proposing the toast that has been entrusted me, The Civil Ferrice of India. It is which needs few words to mend it to any assembly of our country men who are met together as meet to-night, within the limits of that wonderful Enquire which was founded by Robert Clive; -- which was preserved and extended by Warren Hastings:-which has been illustrated by the careers and has learned bomour the names of Thomas Munro, and Charles Metcalie, and Mountstuart Eh hinstone; -of George Clerk of Umballa, of John Laurence, and of Bartle Frere. I know few things that can meet reasonably gratify the just national pride of me than to contemplate the career of those young Englishmen -and when I say Englishmen I am of course Scotchmen and Irishmen as well-who come out year after year to administer Government and Law in this vast dependency of the British Crown. While these of their own and class, whom they have left behind them in the overcrowded Island home, are pining in inaction and discouragement-clergymen without preferment-physicians without fees, or barristers without briefs-the young men of Indian Civil Service are training themselves in In school of statecraft, by actually exercising the functions of Empire. It is scarcely possible to conceive a task of greater difficulty then that they make upon to fulfil,—one more fitted to bring out and test to those talents of practical statesmanship—that coher judgment—that wise moderation-that superiority to the narrowing prejudices of birth, of country, of education, which are among the highest and most needful attributes of a truly Imperial race. These young men come from a land, -the foreseat of the new, industrial civilisation of the West,-where the two great recognised principles of human society are the principle of Individualism and the principle of Progress. They find themselves here in India face to face with a primæval civilisation which rests, as it has ever rested. on the two main bases of Organisation and Association-of Organisation fixed in permanence-of Association, which, running through all the relations. of Life and Society, never leaves the Hindu isolated between the gradle and the grave, - I ough! rather to say, from birth to the burning-groundhis Family, a partnership,—his Village, a community;—his Caste, a bonefit club and a guild. The science with which the young Civilian comes furnished—the modern master-science of the practical West—is a science of Unrestricted Competition: the people among whom he is to apply the principles of that science are at once the masters and the slaves of a vust system of Unrestricted Combinati n. In England alone among the nations-whether for good, or whether for evil, it will be for the future to decide, there has been brought about, slowly but surely, a almost absolute divorce between the millions who till the soil and all proprietary ownership in the soil they till. Even the veoman has become scarce in England—the negant proprietor is virtually extinct. In India, mu the other hand, a peasant proprietary stands it has stood for ages everywhere firmly rooted in the soil-"a stubborn piece of untiquity" to borrow the language of Charles Lamb " compared to which Stonehenge is in its nonage";—as unmoved and changed amid all the vicissitudes of conquest and of empire, - some black basalt crag on the summit of the Ghauts amid the drift and stress of immemorial monsoons. I need not pursue the contrast further; I have said enough to remind tou that the conditions under which the Indian Civil Servant is called upon to carry out the work of edministration in this great dependency-are conditions of the extremest difficulty-conditions which necessarily lead him to think deeply and to think broadly-to busy himself with problems which lie at the very root and core of human welfare and of civil society. But, though he is thus compelled to think, the Indian Civil Servant, by the controlling exigencies of his position, is equally compelled -he has no time to loiter or to dream. And when an consider how wise and beneficent on the whole his of action has been-how often has been the man of introducing order and security in the place of lawdiscord—fertility in place of desert barrenness—the cultivator in the place of the freebester-civilisation in the place of barbariumwe feel that, amid all his difficulties, he has in the main the high Imperial race, the "To regere imperio populos pacisque imponere morem?"—we feel that in the Civil Service of India, England possesses morder of me capable of wielding with practical wisdom Empire which our fathers by adventurous valour, which, day, brethren arms, not unsided by the splendid exertions Civil Service, retrieved and preserved by the might of matchless heroism. these sentiments I minere pleasure in proposing toust of the Civil Service, and in coupling with it the name of the Honour-Mr. Justice Tucker.

Тив Ном'выв Мв. Нимку Римоск St. Сковов Туския, 🔳 текропаing said a regretted extremely the absence of his friend, the Hou'ble Mr. Claudius James Erskine, who had been prevented by indisposition from attending, and who, had he been present, would have responded in much fitting manner than he (Mr. Tucker) could do, to the eloquent speech they had just heard. At the same time, however, he confessed that he was glad have mopportunity efforded him of expressing on behalf of himself nersonally and of his brethren of the service, all the high veneration they felt for the Guest in whose honour this company sembled. They of the Civil Service (and he was now speaking more especially as a Bombay Civilian) felt that they owed a deep debt of gratitude to H. E. Sir Burtle Frere-not because had particularly fostered them = a privileged class,—but because he im taught them in a mem emphatic manby a example highest principles of statesmanship, and, above all, shown them that Livil Service was made for India and the Civil Service. It would hardly becoming in him to any lengthy encomiums on the manner in which His Excellency's government hal be conflucted, but he would his own conviction that there no some of the administration in which traces of his useful labours would not I found, and is which some advancement I been to during his superintendence. He was sure that at the present late hour of evening corpusny would not wish that he should into any lengthy would simply confine himself to expressing thanks of Service, and particularly of those members of it, who me pleasure of joining in this demonstration to His Excellency.

COLONEL W. MARKIOTT in words proposed "Bench and the Bar," and in the absence of the Chief Justice, Sir Richard Couch, compled with the toust the name of the Second Sir Jeseph Armould,

Sin Joseph Armourd replied - ---

I am sorry to am myself upon my legs again, but the modesty diffidence of my juniors-upon whom, according to a rules of ancient etiquette in England, the duty of responding we such was usually devolved-renders it necessary for me to return thanks for the kind and cordial manner in which the toast of the Bench and the Bar has been drunk. Speaking for myself, I must say that I have always found the duty of Bench in India a remarkably interesting occupation, affording as it does, so peculiar means of insight into the habits and character of the native population. The pleasure and satisfaction, however, that I have felt in my work has been very greatly owing to the amenity, courtesy and learning of the gentlemen of Bar, from whom I and my colleagues have always derived the most able and efficient assistance in the administration of justice. sm am of those who think that the amalgamation of the Courts has been a great and decided _____ It has in every way been beneficial. It done much towards the destruction of old class prejudices, and has decidedly tended to improve the administration of justice in the Mofussil. The Barrister Judge who sits on the Appellate and of the High Court learns respect the legal acquirements of his learned Civilian colleagues: young civilians themselves the position of a High Court Judge presents greater attractions than the position of a Sudder Judge did formerly. The feeling of the Service itself with regard | the judicial office and functions, has lately undergone a considerable change for the better. The implicit belief of the Civil Service—the rooted convictions that Ex quovis liono fit judez-if not altogether abandoned (it would be too sanguine perhaps = expect this)-has at all been very considerably mitigated, Some of the ablest members of the Service have cultivated with successful zeal the science of jurisprudence. Some of the more promising among young civilians have given public intimation that, - far - the exigencies of the Service admit, they desire be regarded as candidates rather for judicial its administrative branch. Under these circumstances it is be hoped that we have almost heard the last of the old class cry of trained against untrained Judges, which was once so much too common. I could in any way join in that cry, it always seemed to me ungenerous and unjust. What in fact could be more unfair than a comparison between Barrister Judges of the Presidency Towns, with all the appliances that a centralised administration of justice placed at their command, and Civilian Judges of Mofussil, to their way through masses documents and labyrinths of native testimony without the aid of skilled interpreters and translators without ready reference works of legal authority—above all, without the advantage of a trained Bar-a body of men too honourable mistake or mislead, too learned not to throw all the light that can be derived from established principles and recorded decisions - the point submitted for indicial determination. And now I want His Excellency to take with him across the kala panes sentiment which I will pack up into a small compass for convenient exportation, and it is this: No class of young ____ can be imported from England better fitted for the successful administration of justice in the Mofusnil than the class of civilians who me now coming out to us-young men well grounded in the general principles of jurishrudence, completely versed in the vernaculars, ready, m far as the exigencies of the Service will permit, to devote themselves exclusively in judicial I want His Excellency carry that opinion home with him to be slung, as occasion may serve, in the Indian Council against that redoubtable Goliath of the trained barrister interest, my honourable and learned predecessor. -Sir Erskine Perry. With this great change for the better in the feelings of the civilians towards the judicial branch of the Service, with the prospect that before three years are over our Presidency Bar will be reinforced by the admission into its ranks of the picked men amongst the Native Law Graduates of our University, with what I hope may soon be realised, the permanent promotion of ■ Native Judge to the Bench of the High Court, I feel confident that the Bench and the Bar in India will not in the future be less deserving than you are pleased to think them now, of the honourable and kind welcome with which you have to-night greeted the toast, to which in the name of my colleagues and myself I beg leave to respond with the expression of our sincere and hearty thanks.

MR. J. M. MAGLEAN, in proposing the next toest, said ;-

Although I could wish that the difficult task of proposing the of Merchants are entrusted to some other hands, I think it one which ought to be omitted at any festive meeting in this country where formal are proposed. We ought to forget that it glory of company of English merchants to have acquired the empire of India and added it possessions of the English Crown. We leave of sight our origin, or forget the great truth that it is, after all, commercial enterprise—whatever may be said of the different branches of administration—it is the enterprise of the merchant adventurers. England, that has covered so large a portion of the surface of the earth with states and colonies and dependencies, inhabited by races of possessions.

English tongue, governed by English laws, and owning the supremacy of English and English literature. There is a special fitness such occasion this. I think, in proposing the toust of the Merchants, because of the administration drawing to close that have been keenly criticised are those which affected mercantile interests in Bombay; and I think I am correct in saving many of the excellences and perhaps-if I may be pardoned for using the word-some of the weaknesses of Sir Bartle Frere's Government, have been owing I his anxious desire to bring into greater prominence than has been the in any other part of India the non-official class of this Presidency. Well, Gentlemen, in proposing the toast of the Merchants of Bombay, I think we have reason to congratulate ourselves that we are now able way who are Merchants and who not. I think it is a great blessing for Bombay that have escaped the danger we were in only two years ago of becoming too exclusively and intensely a mercantile community. The people of Bombay seem to me to have broken out of a house of bondage where, though they knew it not, body and soul were being alike enslaved. It is true that we have most of us come out in a somewhat damaged condition, but still it is a pleasure to breaths again the pure and wholesome air, and to find that we have still means and energy left to repair the mischief of the past. There is reason to hope that the future of Bombay will be as prosperous and encouraging as any one may wish, and that it will even realise the dream which our departing Governor formed of its future greatness, if only the Merchants of Bombay, who have to set an example on which much depends, will abandon the delusion that it is by sudden leaps and not by slow and steady steps that either individuals or communities can advance to greatness, and will not only form but act upon the resolution.-

> Not man in inmost thought to think again, The sins that made the past so pleasant to us.

If I to attempt to give you an idea of what my humble opinion is of the model of a Bombay Merchant I should go back to the time when "the Sepoy General," Sir Arthur Wellesley, was breaking the power of the Marathas Assaye, and I should quote of the things he said of Sir Charles Forbes, the founder of the house which is represented at present by gentleman whose I have been asked to couple with this toast. In the despatches of the Duke of Wellington you will find that over and again he speaks of the liberality and public spirit of Charles Forbes. The great Duke was a man who was always very chary of his praise

THE HON'BLE MR. GRONGE FORGO replied as follows ;--

I am confident that you, Mr. Chairman, we less than His Excellency, distinguished Guest, will rejoice at beholding so accompany of British merchants stand up with me to respond to this toast. I am confident that you will rejoice, inasmuch as I make bold to say, that notwithstanding have here to-night efficient representatives of the prowess of our Army, of the gallantry of our Navy, of the wisdom of our Judges, and of the eloquence of our Bar, neither you, Sir, nor His Excellency would consider this assembly adequate representation of the British community, without a strong demonstration on the part of the British merchant. England, and under that many I wish to be understood as including that stern and wild but most fair land north of the I weed-no less than that sister country which rejoices in the most of the Emerald Isle,-England is not ashamed to be considered a commercial country, and wherever from east to west the British Flag is unfurled, there its first duty is to protect the British merchant. It would become me in His Excellency's presence, the more so after the eloquent encomiums - have heard to-night, and after that has passed elsewhere, to say another word in his praise, for Sir,-

To be possessed of pomp,
To guard a title was rich before,
To gild refined gold, to paint the lily,
To throw performe on the violet,
To smooth the ice, was another hue
Unto the rainbow, with taper light
To seek the beauteous eye of heaven to garnish,
Were wasteful and ridiculous excess.

But while I refrain from further reference to the past, I think that I should not be giving adequate expression to the thoughts and feelings that at this moment find place in minds did I not endeavour to say few words regarding the future. The mercantile community of Bombay has during the last two years been tried in the fire, but in spite of the great and heavy losses that have huddled on the backs of some of us,—enough to press royal merchant down,—let us never forget that Bombay is still the Warehouse for half a continent, the Bank for thirty millions of industrime people, and Exchange Mart of three great trades. We still live under a liberal and congenial Government, and if the Government will protect us from foreign quarrels and from intestine commotions, I trust in God, that may again be prosperous. We still have all the natural advantages of situation; mustill have made harbour; but that Harbour must be protected and preserved, or it will only be a second of danger us. I am not about to plunge into the vexed question of Wet Docks. That I gladly leave to be settled as I hope and wast it may be settled as and for all time by the Commission which . I learn from the newspapers has been appointed by Government to consider the question. But although this question, important as it doubtless is, can afford to wait, there are other questions connected with the safety and dignity of our city, which cannot afford to wait, and it is to these, Sir, that with your permission, I will now very briefly allude. If in place of reading, as we have, in the papers of this morning, the deeply interesting intelligence that Her Majesty's Princiand Secretary of State for India, had made, in his place in the British Parliament, the electrifying and thrilling announcement, that the Indian Accounts were henceforth to be made up annually to the 31st March, we had read that Her Mujesty's Government had despatched orders to the Government of India to provide funds, without delay, for the construction of deep Water Dry Docks in the "better half" of our Harbour, not so much for the mercantile shipping of the port as that the noble fleet of transports so soon to ply between Suez and Bombay may find there that unrivalled accommodation and sure protection, all times of the tide and at all seasons which they can find nowhere else-and not have to go begging for assistance from any foreign Government-however friendly that Governmay be. If had read that prompt and decisive action was to be taken for securing a speedy, a regular and an accurate telegraphic service between this country and England, as well by the way of the Red Sea as by the Persian Gulf, and that mesemi-barbarian obstructions should be permitted to interfere with the regular transmission of messages between Bombay and London within a few hours, at any time, and all seasons. If me had read, that without faltering, the safety, dignity, and wealth of Bombay to be promptly secured against every contingency, then, Sir, the British merchant would have felt confident that there was a real states. man at the helm, and would gird up the loins of his mind to renewed efforts to retrieve his shattered fortunes. I say, with all respect, that it is to His. Excellency Sir Bartle Frere that Bombay looks for these things. After brief period of well-earned rest and refreshment, he will, I hope, return to his native country, and there, untrammelled by the ties of party and unencumbered by man expedients for the day that is passing and him, continue patriotic exertions for the benefit of India and for the honour and dignity of England. I would not have it supposed that in asking for Goassistance and Government protection in these Government to do all. Were any member of the Government to do me the honour of inquiring of what, for example, he could do promote develop the trade of the country, I do not know, speaking for myself individually, that I could answer better than has been answered before, Let alone." Make roads, facilitate communications by land and water; remove mitigate all restrictious on trade, whether in the shape of Customs duties, Transit duties, or Town duties, be in short the pioneers of commerce, but do lose yourselves in the main body. Experimentalise as much as you please; exhibit whenever and wherever you please; but leave to follow your example must as maplease; and be very of this, have quite sufficient amongst us of the mercantile element to find out in good time, what is really to our advantage. May peace be perpetual; but more or come peace,—

THE CHAIRMAN then rose and said :-

At this late hour of the night shall occupy you but very short time with the last tonst which will be proposed this evening. It is the tonst of "The Guests," who have honoured with their presence to-night and I am happy to say that I believe on this occasion we have amongst us all those in Bombay whom we could have wished to be here to do honour the Guest of the evening, except such have been prevented by illness from attending. It is not often that occasions like this we can persuade His Lordship the Bishop and other dignified clergy to join us; and I am must all have felt that His Lordship has done us a great honour in responding our invitation and giving us his presence this evening. Without further words I ask you to drink the health of the Guests, who have honoured with their presence to-night, and to couple with it the health of the Lord Bishop of Bombay.

THE RIGHT REVERBED JOHN HARDING, LORD BISHOP on BONBAY, replied on follows;---

I detain you only two minutes, but you will not judge by the fewof my words either I or the other Guests here this evening wanting in gratitude. We do very much indebted you Mr.
Chairman, and the other members of the Club for the gratification you have afforded We feel, Sir, this is no ordinary festivality of those occasions like of which seldom experience. You have gathered us together in honour of whom I have known a long tried public and an eminently tinguished ruler, and whom most if not wo of us have known personal friend :- to witness how he closes an important period of his life, and closes it with all felicitous, and is honourable,-to enter immediately, however, upon another and of laborious service for England and for England's Queen, a period which we will, if possible, he still more ceasful than that which he is closing here. In the seem of the Guesta whom I have the privilege represent,—and I may say in the name of this whole company,-I heartily wish Sir Bartle Frere "Godspeed." And now, Sir, only word Many Gentlemen have spoken here to-night, and have snoken I other times and in other places, of the services which Bartle Frere has rendered to this Presidency and to India I large, -services political, services material, services educational, services municipal, vices of every kind; but it seems me that he has performed important services which have not yet been mentioned—services to the and of religion. of public morals, and of universal benevolence. I am sure that this whole company feels with that, whatever other services he has rendered, these stand pre-eminent; and I am sure I was be understood when I say that I have taken upon me to allude | them, not because they belong to the Church which I represent, or to the Church taken in its widest sense, but because they have ministered unspeakable advantages to the whole community, for Europeans and Natives, evangelized and unevangelized, have all equally shared in this obligation. Sir, I have to return to you and the Members of the Club my grateful thanks for the opportunity of making this acknowledgment, however imperfectly made, and to express in the name of the Guests how very sensible we are of the honour you have done and of the pleasure which you have permitted us to enjoy.

The Sassoon Farewell Ball.

At the close of the supper, Mr. A. D. Sassoon rose and said; — Your Excellency, Ladid, AND Gentlemen,

I will now ask you to drink with me woost, "The Health of Hen Majesty the Queen," which needs only to be mentioned in any part of her world-wide dominions to excite feelings of loyal enthusiasm and respectful devotion to the hearts of British subjects. After this, Mr. Sassoon and said:-

Ladies and Gentlemen,-It is with feelings of peculiar pleasure that I now rise to fulfil the grateful task of proposing to you one more toast, "THE HEALTH OF HIS EXCELLENCE SEE BARCLE - LADY FREED," Our departing Governor has received within the last three or four weeks from all sorts and conditions of men, unmistakeable proofs of the estimation in which he is held by the people of this Presidency whom he has governed so long, and I may say has loved - well; and I cannot by any word of mine add to the eloquent eulogiums that have been passed on his public character and conduct by the leading of European and Native Society in this community. No Governor has ever left the shores of India amidst such general demonstrations of regret : and I am confident of this much, that the tribute we have so gladly paid to Sir Bartle Frere is not lip-service, but the sincere homage of hearts. Whatever differences of opinion may exist among us, however numerous may be the sects, parties, and classes into which we are divided, we all unite in recognising the fearless impartiality. the honesty, and nobleness of purpose, the patient and single-minded devotedness to duty, and the statesman-like ability of Sir Bartle Frere. For my part, I feel that in losing him I lose who was my revered father's most honoured and trusted adviser, and who has been my best and constant friend. On part of Mrs. Sassoon and myself, too, I would thank the amiable and accomplished Lady who has done us the honour to accompany Sir Bartle on his visit to our house this evening, for the unfailing kindness and friendly courtesy which she has extended to us, as so every guest admitted to the delightful social circle at Government House. It pray be long life, increased prosperity, and multiplied honours may be reserved for them in that dear native land to which they are now returning. We in Bombay shall retain enduring recollections of all they have done for us, which watch with affectionate interest every incident in their future career; and to so personally it will ever be a source of sincere pride and satisfaction to reflect that this house has been the scene of probably the last farewell entertainment given in Bombay to so most popular Governor who should be western India. Ladies and Gentlemen, let drink, with every possible honour, health, long life, and prosperity to Sir and Lady Frere.

III EXCELLENCY SIR BARTLE FREEZ I and begged leave. on behalf of Lady Frere and himself, to return their most cordial thanks for the manner in which Mil Sassoon had proposed, and the company received, the toast of their health. There was, to him, circumstance of a peculiarly pleasurable nature in connection with evening's meeting. On other occasions of a similar character whether here, or in Poons, or in Sind,—there had been mingled with the feelings of pleasure natural at such times, a deep and of regret parting from friends, more might be to rejoin them. In this instance, however, there the happy circumstance that me no distant time he would have the gratification of meeting his hospitable entertainers in England; and although it would not be possible to receive them in the same style of princely splendour which witnessed that evening, yet he could them that the pleasure he had derived from their society in this country would be many times multiplied when met them in the West. And he was sure that he mot presumptuous too far upon the feelings of his fellow-countrymen when he ventured to say that Mr. and Mrs. Sassoon, as any bearing their name, -or any relative of theirs-might count upon receiving a hearty welcome in England, not only from those who had been in Bombay, but from who was acquainted with the history of this city. He would call upon the Company to drink Prosperity to the Sassoon FAMILY.

Mr. Sassoon in aknowledging the compliment, said ;-

Ladies and Gentlemen,—On behalf of Mrs. Sessoon and myself, I you heartily for the kind way in which you have received the man ago in the very year in which Sir Bartle Frere began his Indian career, that my father landed in Bombay, and established his house in this city, and the immense progress which Western India has made since then a due in no small measure to His Excellency's labours. We have been very happy you all here this evening, and I thank you again for your kindness.

Club of Western India.

A Farewell Entertainment was given to His Excellency Sir

Frere, by the Members of the above Club.

The Chair was taken by SIR ALEXANDER GRANT, BART.

After the formal toasts "The Queen," "The Prince of Wales" and "The Boyal Family," were given and drunk,

Sir Alexander Grant proposed the million of Sir Barrie Franc. In doing so he commenced by an allu-ion = the existence of the Club itself as instance of direct benefit to the community of Poons, through the direct efforts of Sir Bartle Frere. The speaker proceeded to sketch a short history of the Club from its foundation, and dilated on the great usefulness of the Institution and its value to the community—that very circumstance being one which should serve to mark the fitness of the present ovation, in honor of the Governor who had been all along so closely identified with its existence progress. The Speaker then proceeded we dwell on the beneficial influence Sir Bartle Frere had exercised, all occasions, on society in all its phases and dwelt much upon the meritorious efforts of the Governor in the of the general progress of the people. In doing him honour therefore, the Club honored itself. Sir Bartle Frere had himself alluded elsewhere to the state of things existing at Poons before the institution of the Club; of its benefit to the community, the proceedings of that evening were in themselves m instance and a proof; and me which the community was, in mall measure, to be congratulated. In the olden times, before the institution of the Club, there | literally no place at Poona where their present proceedings could have been conveniently held. In fact the present occasion and of itself an instance of the progress of social affairs among under the superintendence of Sir Bartle Prers. The speaker than proceeded notice in their order and of the prominent public of the Governor, chiefly in connection with the society wich is a markedly and personally influenced in his public many in Bombay. These benefits been very great, as they been very and scarcely their recapitulation, to bring them to the memory of all present at that meeting. The speaker then briefly reviewed the political Sir Bartle Frere, alluding to the main occurrences which had taken place during Government This Presidency. Turning from things political he many that in no instance had any retiring Governor carried with of the really well-earned respect of the entire community than Bartle Frere. memory would live long among people. marked by very many circumstances, which would long keep green. had disseminated thousand blessings, and long the results of these lasted, the memory of him who had effected them would last, fresh and strong. And the wisdom of his government was practically prominent in the fact that the times he had to steer, during a great portion of mublic life, and of the greatest possible difficulty and complexity. By example m well m precept, he had animated and encouraged his colleagues to exertion which had had its due effect in a result markedly cessful. The speaker concluded with a brief allusion to the connection of Sir Bartle Freze's labours with the education of the people ;-and the toast on its being proposed. - received with applicate and renewed application.

HIS EXCELLENCY SIR BARTLE FREEE returned thanks for the in which the toast of his health had been proposed and received. He said, much as the partial kindness of his friends had disposed them to over-rate the services he had been enabled to perform, in the office he had filled, at thing had, at least, not been exaggerated : and that was the reality of his endeavours to consult the best interests of the community in every measure resolved upon by the Government of Bombay. He would not have it forgotten, however, that he was unwilling to take to himself the great credit which had been accorded him, without prominently declaring in how great a degree he had been assisted and benefited by the able and unfailing advice of those gentlemen who had formed his Council. His Excellency then proceeded to allude to other and former occasions on which the members of the Club had done him honour in that room, and he commented - the gradual progress of the Club, from its early and comparatively small beginning to its proud and useful position.

SIR CHARLES STAVELEY in proposing the health of LADY AND THE

Gentlemen, —I rice to propose — of the Lady whose privilege it is to — and joys of our excellent Governor, — Lady, Gentlemen, who, during her stay amongst us esteem of us all. We all know how much Lady Frere has done to promote sociability and every good work, and I here allude not only to the pleasant gatherings at Ganeah Khind and Mahableshwar, but to the great the has always taken in matters of more permanent to our munity.

SER BARTLE FRAME,—We beg you will express to Lady Frere how fully all her amiable have been appreciated by the members of this Club, and their families; and we trust, that her future in England, will be one where the qualities we have learnt walne here, will have, if possible, even a wider field.

Gentlemen, we drunk the health of Sir Bartle Frere just now, but we drank only half his health. We will now drink the other half, that ill His Excellency's better half, Lady Frere.

BARTLE FREEE again rose and returned thanks for the toast proposed by Sir Charles Staveley in behalf himself, and Lady and the Frere; after which His Excellency proposed, "The Club."

HOROUGABLE BARROW HELERET ELLES acknowledged the toast on behalf of the Club, and thanked the Governor for honour done them that evening, by his having accepted their invitation; coming up Poons from Bombay, for the purpose of affording them the opportunity doing themselves the honor of offering this, their parting mark of the esteem and regard in which he was held by all classes. He alluded principally to the social excellencies of the relation which had uniformly between the Club and His Excellency, and congratulated upon that fact. He was all particularly to the completeness of that general cordiality of feeling which animated the Club on all matters, especially in that which was the aim and object of this meeting of its members, and ended by proposing the toast of the Army and the Nasy.

GREERAL P. K. SERRERE transled the proposer as well as the Greets for the manner in which this subject had been received; gave a brief outline of the services with which the Bombay Army had in late campaigns been concerned; and pointed in glowing language that the Army in Navy as world. In his turn he gave "Top Civil Service on Bornay"; a service rendered illustrious by having included in its ranks many able administrators, conspicuous among them was their Guest of the evening, Sin Barria Frence.

Mr. France Leave returned thanks on the office the little with the alluded, in graceful terms to the compliment which had been paid to the service and in brief alluded to the difficulties under which its peculiar duties and functions had to be discharged.

- "I can have besitation in stating that I fully concur in, and can endorse every word of, and late Sir Richmond Shakespeare's memorandum, and that it is simply impossible. In my opinion, to do adequate justice to Raja Dinker man services and admirable character in man documents.

His administrative ability and thorough knowledge the people generally Gwalior (including elase, which the the of Government, and the various tribes and making up the two millions odd subject to the rule of Makaraja Sciadia), and the making up the two millions odd subject to their requirements, and the real interests of the State his chief, alded by singular acquaintance with, and appreciation of, the merits defects system of administration, from the date of his assumption the Dewanship, to introduce improvements, order, arganisation every branch and department of the State, and in a wonderfully brief time, under the directmentances, to establish a Government such as had never before existed in the territories of his master, and which gave promise, if maintained in the spirit and on principles in which it me conceived, to make Gwalior the first kingdoms.

In all the Honourable Raja had much to contend with for his many influential policy of the governing of country, to the interests of the many influential persons who interests of the good judgment, aided by the example of unimpeachable integrity is set to all around him, enabled him to effect what to those acquainted with the circumstances of the State might well have appeared hopeless.

The people country were relieved from the system of oppression and misrale which an made sum districts, as Tourghar, prey to the sound disorder, which an Durbar possessed no real anthority but such as was exercised guns of a large military force, and the revenue periodically collected at point of the bayonet; and had made others, as Kanghur, which had formerly been prosperous and fourishing, in many parts a desert, and abandoned by its impoverished

To this policy the majory of Maharaja Scindia and during the of may assuredly be fairly and justly assured: the people generally, of taking advantage the disruption of authority consequent mutiny and of British native Troops (including local contingents), on the peace of the territories of Central India had previously principally depended, and who peoply sympathised with by all, actively by many of the troops and armed police of the native states, remained obedient to lead officials and the presence at the capital of a large number of them, hastily collected and summaned by the Minister for the purpose, enabled Maharaja of the Gwalior contingent, which, consider of the support the Gwalior and the many influential people in the Luckier and about the Chief, for appared of three eventful months cadeaveured to cajole mempal His Highness comply with their objects and demands.

The triumphant in which Scindis emerged from these difficulties was, viewed by the light of former times, best proof of the wisdom of the measures of administration previously adopted by the Minister. Throughout the trying events of 1857-58 Raja Dinkar Rao's devotion services to master beyond all praise. In was in truth an impersonation in his services to his chief, and of order amidst the wild anarchy them raging, and which threatened to sweep away before it; and his attachment for, and friendly good faciling towards, the British Government and its services when the power of that Government and its services when the power of that Government is lowest point of depression, when the power of that Government and experienced meaning the forgetten by the services of the content of the power of the content of administration of the Mulior State which followed, the position of the Minister unavoidably became greatly altered.

The Maharaja desired to direct the Government himself and to retain the business of administration wholly in his own hands; and after a time Raja Dinhar Raowithdrew, not without grief and disappointment, from the laborious post he had filled for eight years with unmeasurable benefit to his Chief and the State, and with lasting credit and benow to himself.

In truth his work for the time was done, and II was but fitting that he take some repose from the wearying fatigues of the business and struggles incidental to the high position he had held for so long a period.

He was not however, suffered to remain unneticed j for on the the Governor-General's Legislative Council in 1861, he was among the first members selected to sit therein as representatives of the native community of the Empire.

His services and in it the lofty and novel sphere to which he was thus were much as might have been expected from his previous career and character, and are well known to have been much appreciated by the Victory of India.

I the date at the I am writing, the Honourable Raja's term of service in the having expired, he is unemployed and living ill retirement, and there appears to be at present no prespect of his return to the business of public life in a fitting position.

It me a subject of the deepest regret to me that the services of one so experienced set gifted, by far and in every respect the ablest native administrator I have met, should be thus less to the public; but there seems to be me help therefor me present.

Whatever the future may have in this respect in store for Microcurable Raja Rato-and that the time or later come when, if spared, he will re-occupy a public post suited to his great talents and high character I have confidence;—he must for the present console himself with the proud gratifying conviction that, as remarked by Sir Richmond Shakespeare, he respected beloved by rich and poor of his own country, in which his name will long be known par excellence. Down, he enjoys the high consideration the Government, and the regard of such of its officers as have had pleasure knowing him either privately or officially."

The following is a sketch of his career taken from Miss Carpenter's Six Months in India, Vol. 111:—

"The late Framji Kavanji Esquire, whose recent decease as a subject of regret with the European and native community of Bombay, belonged to the family Banaji, which, with that of Wadia and Dadysett, have been long distinguished for wealth and commercial enterprise; and in works of charity and benevolence been second only to that very remarkable man, Sir Jamestji Jejesbhoy Knight, magnificent fortune has been created by individual acuteness surpassed only by a munificence which has prompted the crection and endowment of spacious receptacles for the sick and indigent, and in performance through a long life of almost the extent of which is known only to him before whom they have make memorial.

Although Framji Kavanji Banaji never had the wealth with which as to provide physical comfort of countrymen, he was very constantly foremost in for their mental culture and many improvement.

From the time when the genius of Mr. Elphinatone sought incite upper of natives to the introduction of national education, Framji Kavasji been distinguished as the most active promoter of this object. He may original member the Elphinatone Lastitution; and, until advancing years and increasing infirmities induced him to retire, was year after year elected by his countrymen represent that at the Board of Education. was the first Parai gentleman who educated the Females of his family.

^{*} Board of Kiumition in their annual Report for 1850-51, thus wrote respecting III Framji Kavasji's services to the cause of Education ;--

[&]quot;At a later period in the year, Franci Kavasji Kaquire, resigned his seat, in consequence advanced time of life, and the vacancy by the election of Bamonji Hormasji Esq. The eminent good citizenship, and seal in supporting every measure for public improvement, which distinguished and much esteemed colleague, are well known to your Lordship in Council need any notice from us, but in recording his death, which subsequently occurred at the good of 84, the Board feel a melancholy pleasure in thus publicly expressing respect in which they hold memory."

And Government in their Resolution on the above, dated 6th September 1851,

[&]quot;In conclusion, I can instructed to cheeve that the tribute which have paid in the second para: of their Report to the late Framji Eavanji Eaq. has been very properly randered on this occasion to the memory of an excellent and deterving man. The Right Hon'ble the Governor in Council gladly avails and deterving man. The Right Hon'ble the Governor in Council gladly avails and this opportunity again to express the high opinion entertained by himself and his predecessors of the worth of the decessed as one who purceived that he could best serve his country by encouraging education, and who noted up to his persuanton."

Franji Kavaji was one of the twelve whom who first held we Commission of the Pesce, and those who was not on the Bench with him, remember the independence importiality which we administered justice.

He was likewise a Member of the Man. Panchayet, which, so long so the Society admitted, exercised so beneficial so influence so the morals of the community, and the records of that institution are stamped with many tokens of his strong some and excellent judgment.

Fire Temple, raised by Framji Kavaqi 'and his brothers to the worship of God after the manner of their fathers, and the Tower of Ellenoe constructed for the reception of the body after death, at a cost of two in of rupess, may permanent memorials of his piety and his respect for the manner of mancient religion; while the Dhobee's Tank, and in reservoir the Obeliak Road—to which water to conducted from manner in Girgaum, the produce of which he set apart to this supply of water to the public—betokens that his henevolence may not limited the frateraity which he was a member.

perpetuate a memory of man of character and foregoing is a very hasty and imperfect sketch, the Englishman, Mussulman, and the Hindu, as well in the Parxi, have expressed a similar and the stadents, the representatives at moment, of those to whose intellectual and moral advancement in life devoted, have taken the lead of all a commencing this work 1 and it is with the view of giving each apportunity of contributing to this object, and it is circulated, the particular mode of effecting such being left for future consideration.

It was a beautiful and natural and of no much genuine goodness, that, for first time, persons of a classes and denominations, Natives and Europeans, united together to respect to memory. On September 22nd 1852, English and many native Gentlemen with a large number of the Scholars Elphinatone Institution headed by the Assistant Professor, Dadabhoy Nowroji, consider the most fitting way of testifying their admiration and esteem.

"That the funds which have been already collected, and such others may be subsequently added, be appropriated to the formation of a Museum in connection students, Literary and Scientific Scoiety; and that this meeting units with them in requesting Government mercet mediately, to contain lecture room, a laboratory, means of mand industry, and library, and to permit the building to be called the Framiji Kavasji Institute."

In moving above resolution, Professor Patton observed:-

"The mode of commemorating the name of Framji Kavasji seems to be peculiarly appropriate. When the Studente' Literary and Scientific Society was in in infancy and when many friends of education, were either cold or unfavourable to it, Framji Kavasji came forward and showed his approval of their plans and objects, by presenting a number of launu, which he heard they required for their usestings. gift to the Society was the commencement of seem others, and to the day of death he took a warm interest in all their proceedings. During his long career (as you have heard detailed today). He was always foremost in every effort to extend education in country, and his views of what education ought in he were by m elevation, and m the min time a practicality, min could scarcely have seemed a supported from the imperfect education he himself had received. He was one of the chief contributors to the erection of the building in which we are assembled and which has as was satisfipated, risen to the rank of a College, Nearly a quarter a century when the native community of Bombay we consider the appropriate method of attesting their affectionate and respectful sentiments towards 📖 Honograble Mountetuart Elphinstone, Framjee Kavasji in uspeech replete good war and sound views which in our testimonial-giving might worthy attention, proposed that me satisfactory and durable plan m carrying will wishes into effect, was to found was a professorships for teaching the English language, the arts, science, and literature of Europe, The Students' Literary and Scientific Society is the direct result of that education, and m proof the wisdom and foresight that suggested it."

value of the infinence of this admirable man is well manifested in infollowing extract from the speech of Mr. Dadabhoy Nowroji;—

"I refrain myself from expressing my continents towards this worthy man. I have had but man for all a talk with him, but the impression that that single visit made upon me, and my friend Ardaseer, shall were off. It was for the purpose of asking support to the female schools and how could I and describe a support sould only be were I fet I shall try. We approached with great trepidationknew will what should be the result of the visit; for me knew not the man it was now first visit. Its Framji showed that he was always prepared in receive some a child with pleasure that brought good tidings of any kind. Many was sound advices he was us at to an economet in the undertaking—many hopes did like and in and shewed great that he could not stretch out an good an helping hand as he we wont in do before. Ill advices, however we worth than any thing else, and have the opportunity of expressing our obligations for the summer with fill followed these advices; triffing as they might often appear, they are forerunters of great things to the Triffing of the think lamp present the same of the same than the same of the sa the Society might appear, it was the kindler of the first spark of hope that an earnest desire and en, eavour to do me useful thing shall never fail to be properly appreciated."

Many difficulties occurred before the completion of the plan, and the 22nd February 1862, and foundation was mid by his friend, and Henographe Mr. Jaganusthji Saakamett.

HONOURABLE JAMES ERSKINE, COUNCIL, BOMBAY.

How'ser Ser,—We, the undersigned inhabitants of the Town and so of Bombay, desire to express to you, on behalf of the native community, the feelings of unfeigned regret with which we contemplate your approaching retirement from the service of the State and departure from our native land. And in doing we wish to convey to you the thanks of the community for the great services which you have rendered to secondary.

these services are more conspicuous than those which will ever connect your man with the cause of Education. Bombay; early in your man as a Member this Presidency, and when the colebrated Despatch of 1854 reached us, Bombay fortunate enough to find in you her first Director of Public Instruction, admirably fitted by training, by ability, by temperament, and by knowledge of the people, to take the initiative in organizing a sound and liberat system popular education. We are convinced that a large measure of the man which the new educational department has achieved in this Presidency is due to the ability with it converges and the wise the spirit in which it was introduced worked during your administration.

After you had esseed to be Director of Public Instruction, you continued your behalf is education, as Vice-Chanceller of the University of Calcutta and as a little of Council since your return to Bombay.

Your subsequent services in the Indicial Department seem to less distinguished; and seem or exaggeration that, in your administration that as Judge Konkan afterwards on the Bench of the High Court, you have been universally regarded by community were very personification of Distract "Justice."

Your elevation the Legislative Council of Kreellency Vicercy and Governor-General in 1880 still further extended your sphere of usefulness. For your statesman-like views enabled you to exercise a marked influence for good course of the Imperial legislation during your your occupied a seat at the Calcutta Council Board.

During the last year and a half the Bombsy Government immediately benefited by your experience and advice. And we had beped that you would have retained your in in Council for several years to indicate this is not to be. Your health has given way under the weight of the incessant and heavy labours the conscientious discharge of your duties has imposed upon you through a long series of years. And you is seek repose in your native land.

In bidding you farewell, allow us, Sir, sgain to express to you the deep respect with which me regard your character, public and private, and permit us to think you not only for the direct benefits which your labours have produced, but also for the bright example which you have afforded to all of a pure and single-minded devotion to duty.

We wish you a prosperous voyage to England, where we trust under Divine Providence you may long continue to enjoy, with your Family, continued health and happiness.

This neither the time are place to refer to great and aniable qualities; but upon behalf of the Bar, I beg to express we very deep regret for one who, in the prime of life and in the fullness and freshness of his intellectual vigour, has been thus so suddenly carried away from amongst us. I humbly request, the part this Bar, that, as a tribute of respect to memory, your Lordships will yield to wishes and adjourn the Court until to-morrow."

The Chief Justice said;—Mr. Advocate General,—"The Judges most desply sympathise with the Bar in the loss that they have sustained. As you yourself perhaps may not be the time for us to speak of the merits of the learned gentleman whose sudden death have to deplore; but we quite in the desire you express that the Court should in tribute of respect to the memory of Howard; therefore none of the Courts on the Civil Side will sit to-day."

D., retired from the Directorship of Public Instruction on the 26th September 1868, to take up the high office of Principal of Edinburgh University, to which was elected in succession to the late venerable and world-famous philosopher, Sir David Brewster. His pupils subscribed for a Portrait in oils and of life size, to be placed in the Bombay University Buildings, and the surplus, if any, be appropriated for a prize in Moral Philosophy. P. 109, line 14.—Alluding to the retirement from India, of Dr. John McLennan, the late Board of Education in their Report dated 1st May 1855, stated as follows;

"To Dr. McLennan, in particular, - feel that we me bound, in mespecial manner, to express our feelings of gratitude for the able, scalous, and discriminating assistance we at all times received from him. We feel equally bound to remark, that he invariably took a distinguished part in our proceedings, and was ever earnest in furthering all measures baving for their object the promotion of the educational interests of Western India. III long connection with the department of education, -his experience of fifteen years - member of our body, -and his consequent intimate acquaintance with the history and progress of Native Education in this Presidency, - proved of the highest advantage in promoting the interests of our different institutions, and precially of the Grant Medical College. His loss to this Institution, in particular, will long be felt as peculiarly heavy. Connected for a quarter of a century with the seem of Kative Medical Education, and having himself experienced personally the difficulties with which it was surrounded. his practical, and at the same time enlarged and calightened views, proved of the highest value in gniding the arrangements of an institution, in the successful working of which he took the deepest interest. We feel, indeed, that Dr. McLennan has earned a high place among those who have laboured for the development and Improvement of the Native mind."

"The McLennan Scholarship and Prize Medal — the results of a public meeting held in January 1955, to commemorate the public services and the private virtues." Dr. McLennan. There is a natural propriety in desiring to preserve, in connection with a Medical College, the memory of Physician of more endowment and suggesty and there is a moral propriety in desiring to keep ever before the minds of our Indian Graduates the bright example of one in whom the moral and intellectual qualities which dignify the profession of Medicine were blended in admirable harmony,—in whom firmness — tempered by tenderness, patience, and charity, in whom quick perception — regulated by sound — cautious judgment, and who, — all the relations of life was guided by high principles of honour and integrity. But there is a special propriety in associating the name of Dr. McLennan with the Grant College. — member of the

Dr. Charles Mershead .- "Before detailing our proceedings during the session, I desire, upon the part of my colleagues and myself, to record our deep sense of the we have sustained by the retirement of Dr. Morehead from the Office of Principal. Compelled by illhealth, in the year 1859 to seek for change of climate. connection with the Callege has now finally mand. Associated m I have been with Dr. Morehead for many years as a colleague and friend, it would become me meak of him in terms of enlogy; man is impossible, in justice to the College myself, that we can be content with a simple announcement of his retirement. Not only this College organised and matured by him with an amount of forethought and judgment which have been scarcely equalled, but scarcely a step taken towards its foundation with which he is not identified. Rnjoying the privilege III a close personal friendship with the distinguished individual whose many it bears, and to whose memory it has been erected as a tribute, he was a active participator in every measure that me adopted by Sir Robert Grant for establishing system of medical education . Entering upon his duties an when the judgment is ripened by experience, he engaged in the performance of them wiger and enthusiasm every teels in carrying out a soheme of his own creation. has been unmistakeable: not only is it known in this country by IIII fruits, and by the testimony of all who are capable of judging It. I has been acknowledged a another place, by the selection of Dr. Morehead. for appointment to one of the most honorable offices that can devolve upon a teacher of medical science. But seem that my are bidding one late Principal farewall," we do not alone think of him as the successful teacher. We, both professors and students, cannot but tall to mind m unvarying kindness and sympathy, his deep sense of justice and of duty, -his trathfelness, his consistency, -his self-denial. Never led by impulse,—with a mind regulated by the closest self-discipline,—during a period of fifteen years that I have been associated with him, a murmur was never uttered either by his colleagues or his pupils, against the justice of his decisions. Greatly as all who have the promotion of Education at heart was regret Dr. Morehead's departure from India, they have the satisfaction of knowing week does not wholly depart with him. He leaves behind him in result of his experience in a medical work, which, whilst it has raised him in the highest rank as a Pathologist and a Physician, will exercise a lesting influence study may practice of Medicine m this country."

Dr. John Ped, and Dr. Herbert Girand,- "Dr. Post resigned his appointment as Principal Professor of Medicine from the let January 1865, and was succeeded as Principal by Dr. Giraud; but Dr. Giraud's health, already impaired, was seriously affected by we hot weather and the raims. was he was under the necessity of seeking a change in Berope, and, on leaving Bombay in October last, he resigned his appointments as Principal and Professor . Chemistry Botany. Drs. To their lot fall the laborious work of organizing their several departments both in the College and in the adjoining Horatal, leaving to their the case task in following a route already traced. That this work was fudiciously designed, and Well accomplished, is proved by the fact that no changes in principle, and but few in detail, have been since found - be necessary. The steady energy, the directness of purpose, and the calm judgment of Dr. Peet inspired respect and lightened difficulties; to his operative the Jamestji Hospital owes the foundation of its fame as a school of _____ and the admirable text-book | which he has left behind will keep his name in hating remembrance among all present and succeeding students in this College. Im minor contributions to the medical sciences, mostly published from time to time in the Transactions of the Medical and Physical Society, IIII result of much and careful observation. are of well-known value for that accuracy and originality."

"Dr. Giraud has laboured in a field. His delight has been to further knowledge, the appreciation, the leve of nature, both in the mineral and vegetable kingdoms, as far as was connected with the study of our profession. Wivid perception of the beauty and harmony natural laws lent additional charin to a graceful and ready delivery, by giving a heartime to his teaching which could not but render it impressive and well-remembered. His services to botanical science, in reference to the botany. Western India, have already been acknowledged by the Horticultural Society, and the Transactions of our Medical and Physical Society have been enriched by frequent contributions from his pen. His kindness of heart and manner drew towards him, and rendered it easy pleasant to work, whether under him a subordinate, or with him a colleagus. The students of the College addressed Dr. Poet Dr. Giraud their departures with expressions of the highest esteem and good will, and subscribed a sum of money for the execution of a bust of Dr. Poet, which might placed in the college as a worthy fallow to that of Dr. Morshead."

To these may be added the name of Matthew Stovell, M. D., C. S. I., whose services are enumerated in following: General Order, 115th January 115th

- P. 242, line, 4, P. 288, line 14, and P. 334, line 11.— James John Berkley, Esq., M. I. C. E., F. G. S.— The following extracts are taken from his Memoir;—
- completed his education at King's College, London, under Dr. Major. He articled to Mr. Wicksteed, M. I. C. B., then Engineer of the East London Water Works, In the year 1836, but very soon with him, and entered the Office of Mr. George P. Bidder, M. I. C. B., and in 1839 he may be said to have commerced his real pupilage under Mr. Rebert Stephenson, M. I. C. B., by whom he was very actively employed, travelling with his Chief, writing reports for him upon his successful works, arbitrations and other engagements,

Among these may be mentioned the Docks at Cardiff; the examination a system of railways projected to connect Landon, Brussels, and the various towns of the North of Brance, with Paris, which mus reported m by the late Robert Stephemon in 1842; the Caseel and the Leopold Railways; the construction of the Northampton and Peterborough, the Trent Valley, the Churnet Valley, and the North Staffordshire Railways, mu which latter Mr. James J. Berkley and the position of Engineer.

At the latter end the year 1849, Magineer ability, experience judgment being required to go to Bombay to lay out mextensive system of railways that Presidency, J. J. Berkley was so strongly recommended for the important work by Budger, and other eminent Engineers who know and appreciated talents, Magineer the Great Indian Peninsula, Railway, and Magineer the Great Indian Peninsula, Railway, an hebour entailed upon Mr. Berkley by the works he had undertaken, health, and winited England the year 1856. Advantage was of the opportunity, by a number of the principal Civil Engineers, invite him to dine with them; when Stephenson, who occupied the chair, spoke thus former papil:—

"Gentlemen,— I wery sincere pleasure in presiding an antertainment, which I offered to my friend Mr. James Berkley. I I that on the present occasion it is necessary to enlarge the professional acquirements, or talents, or the social virtues of my friend, for im has already, prominently brought himself to your notice by his professional under exceedingly trying and adverse circumstances, and by the second which is held by all who know him. Very early in his life, and when I was tolerably advanced in my career, he man introduced to my notice as a young and professionally inexperienced man, but a very short acquaintance and association with him, convinced me that he was possessed of a good heart and a good head, and in a short time he became not only confidentially associated with in professional life, but my. intimate friend in my domestic circle. I freely imparted to him my will views and opinions, and employed him in the construction of several of the principal entrusted to me. When the opportunity for his going to India presented itself, I felt me he had embarked in an exceedingly difficult task, Having mybeen thrown in early life upon wwn was in a foreign country where angineering operations were of a very difficult character, I well knew the variety and nature of the obstacles he would have to encounter, and you will readily comprehend how operations, even such as are easy in this country, would become extremely arduous when undertaken abroad. The Directors of the Railway Company influenced by recommendation, strengthened as it by the highest testimonials, and me friend went to India, where he has amply justified the opinion I had formed of his capabilities and has successfully minimum numerous difficulties and impediments of m ordinary character. A favourite expression my father's, in his early many was - I my engineer matter very well, but my great difficulty is in engineering men.' Mr. Berkley, has, I am happy may, succeeded not only in engineering matter in a foreign country, with few available resources for railway operations, but he has also been eminently successful in that meet difficult task of engineering No small tribute to talents and temper.

It is scarcely necessary for me to do more than allude briefly to the works executed by our Guest, during his comparatively short stay in India. He has already executed 90 miles of railway which are on the point of being opened as far me the Ghauts, the great physical feature of the West of India. The question of the ascent me the Ghauts is one of considerable difficulty, and demanding much knowledge, skill, and consideration. Excellent designs of them have, however, been prepared by Mr. Berkley, and me explanations he has afforded me are so minute and interesting, that I assure you I should feel proud being the author of the plane he has proposed. Throughout these operations has encountered all the formidable chatacles which the Chaute present, and overcome them with remarkable success. And this redounds all the more to his credit, when we consider, that the Ghauts present greater engineering difficulties than either the passage of the Sommering to Trieste, or the Giovi Incline between Turin and Genoa; and that the ascent of these mountains was long considered barely practicable. Although these mountain inclines are serious undertakings, it is compulsory for the good of the country to make and to maintain them, and, in spite of and difficulties. Mr. Berkley has, after six years of laborious research, succeeded in designing a series of lines, which I have me doubt will be amongst the most successful in the world. I trust however, that greater wisdom will be displayed by the Indian Government than by our Home legislature in that respect. That they will be watched with something was like perental care, for here they have been deserted like prodigal sons. India demands accommodation for an accommodation, and if the railways are permitted to be extended with discretion and wisdom, there cannot be a question that they will be both beneficial to these who have invested capital in the enterprise, and of incalculable advantage to that important country. My friend at my side has also the bonour, whether accidental or not, of being the Engineer who constructed and opened the first Railway in India. This is no small credit to him, and in all that he has done I feel proud of him, and that reflected honour upon my recommendation."

Notwithstanding the extent and the laborious nature of his professional duties, Mr. Berkley took an active part in many of the useful and accentific institutions of Bombay. In the Mechanics' Institution especially he took a lively interest, and by his personal exertions and active measures, — President, he greatly increased its sphere of public utility and gave an interest to its proceedings which had before been wanting.

The Council of the Mechanics' Institution has accorded a "Berkley Gold Medal" annual prize for competition among its members in commemoration of his valuable services, and the first Gold was sent to his widow with a resolution expressing sympathy and condulence.

Mr. Berkley's energy is mind far exceeded his physical strength, which was suffering severely from the effects of the Indian climate, so that in April, 1861, the state of his health compelled him to return to England. At that time he had the satisfact' of secing his plans and designs of the Dhore Ghaut, his most cheriahed work fully developed, and the works being carried with extraordinary activity under very efficient management. He eagerly desired to return to India witness the accomplishment of the great work he had designed and almost carried out to completion, but it was otherwise ordered; and after a lingering illness he closed his short but useful career, at Sydenham, on the 25th August 1862.

From early loyLood, James John Berkley showed signs of great activity of mind and love knowledge. was a great reader, and ready with per ma contributor to general literature, or as a clear and able write professional subjects. In after years, when his position in India called forth partirular telent, he proved himself both as President of the Bombay Mechanics' Institution, the meetings and on public occasions, a fuent and indeed reloquent speaker,

By his devoted attention to the important duties of his office on Chief Engineer in Bombay, of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway, by his high sense of honor, by his gantlemanly bearing and liberal sentiments, as well as by the kindness and consideration which he ever displayed towards all those who were connected with him in husiness, he deservedly obtained the exteem and affectionate regard of all who knew him.

P. 246, note.—Sir Erskine Perry, Knight, Chief Justice of Bombay, resigned his seat on the Bench on the 17th November 1852; when the Native Community headed by the late Honourable Jagannathji Sankarsett, addressed him of follows:—

We can, without fear of incurring the charge of flattery safely assert that your residence at Bombay had been in Mishest degree conducive to your reputation and to the welfare of the community. There is a progressive spirit of improvement abroad in India as well as in Europe, and in conformity with this spirit has been your whole judicial career. You have laboured successfully to diminish exponse, to simplify process, to shorten litigation, and to make justice accessible to all. In their Report for the year 1852-53, the Board of Education recorded their deep sense of the great loss they sustained by Sir Erakine Perry's retirement from India = follows:—

"For the lengthened period of nearly nine years, during which he important post, is devoted a powerful intellect and is cultivated mind to the great cause of Native sulightenment. Throughout his important he proceeded in the important that the higher branches of education could only be taught effectively through the medium of the English language; but he fully admitted, in the other hand, that the great is of the population is of necessity be educated solely through the channel of their vernacoulars. In he is not only a powerful advocate for education in English,— through the medium of which alone, in the present state is vernacular literature, and the important of European literature and science be communicable to the native mind,— is he at the same time afforded marked ancouragement is education conducted through the medium of the student's mother tongue.

Among the many hasting memericals of Sir Brekine Perry's exertions of our Board, we may, perhaps, be allowed allowed allowed to one of the most important as well as of the most recent; viz, amangamation of the Poons Banskrit College with the Poons English School, thus happily uniting under most record at study. Raglish and Sanskrit with the vernacular of Deccan and carrying wholesome reform into College which gives promise of becoming one of the many important institutions in India.

We _____ remark, however, that few have _____ such opportunities as ourselves _____ appreciating ____ extensive acquirements, _____ enlarged views, _____ untiring zeal, and _____ for those parsaits _____ so eminently qualified him for presiding at our Board, "

And Dr. Stovell, the Secretary to Board, in lefter No 677 dated 10th November 1853, to Sir Erskine Perry, as follows;—

"I medesired nonvey to you the expression of their sincers regret at then losing valuable services in the Board of Education, me which you have president and nearly since years in such marked benefit to the public of this Presidency.

Your colleagues feel point annibly your enlarged intellect, your mind, your indefatigable industry and the influence arising from your high independent position, have contributed in a marked degree to the extension of principles which public Native education is necessarily conducted; and they feel certain that the beneficial effects of your exertions will long the throughout the Provinces this Presidency.

It was a manus of much gratification without wilears from you that, in their efforts we promote the man great object of the Board, those unavoidable collisions of opinion, which have occasionally occurred, have not disturbed that mutual good feeling which whas been their wish at all times wantain.

They feel most grateful for your kind offer of centinuing to aid them may require assistance, and they desire me to express their fervant hope that your life and health may long be spaced to the benefit of the public and the happiness of your family. "

Hon'ble John Warden, President of the Board of Education, and annual distribution of prizes, which took place in the Tewn Hall and 2nd April 1853, said:—

"Sir Erskine Perry, whose will descend to posterity second to that of Elphinstone only, the promoter public education this of India, and doubt devoted his leisure hours to the benefit the country from which he drew income. Reforms in his own profession, by which the administration justice has been simplified and rendered accessible to poor, and the laying broad and deep the foundation those principles by which education of an ordinary kind shall the peasurity their mother tongue, and the edvanced and more polished education. Europe rendered accessible the higher and more intellectual portion of society, the objects to which applied erudition, talents, and philanthropy; and that he not labour vain betokened by the impeter that was given education in his time.

Presidency has done honour to to itself in the expression, was echoed from Madras, of their gratitude for his exertions; and I hope we have his name perpetuated among us in connection with two favourite objects, in the shape of a Professor of Jurispradence Exphinatone College for which Ruropean Mative Inhabitants of Bombay have subscribed liberally."

The Right Honourable the Governor of Bombay in Council in a letter No 4075 dated 15th November 1852, (signed by Hon'ble D. A. Blane and A. Bell,) in accepting the resignation of Erakine Perry President of the Board of Education, wrote to him as follows:—

"We gladly avail ourselves of the opportunity to acknowledge ability and with which, for a period of nearly nine years, you have this important post, and to state in particular that have been fully sensible the which you have invariably shown to the instructions of the Government where not exactly in accordance with your own views, though placed by high position which you occupied, beyond the ordinary pale of our authority, and the ordinary stimulus official praise and censure.

We recall mind on this occasion your manufactured advocacy of the English language with only efficient of imparting instruction to well Natives in the higher branches of learning. Though concurring in the main in this opinion, we were unable, myou aware, to coincide altogether as to the relative degree in which encouragement should be given to vernacular education and to the apparior order of tuition through the medium of English.

It gives us, therefore, now the greater gratification to be able to allude to your realous and persevering efforts to raise the standard of education in the vernacular languages; would particularly advert to your successful endeavours to establish normal classes for the training of vernacular to increase the number of superintendents of the vernacular schools and to reader the tuition imparted in them.

But perhaps, the most important step which has been taken by the Board under your superintendence, and, chiefly men have meet to believe, in pursuance your rem design is the amaignment of the Sanskrit College with the English school Poons, and the organization of a men College in their rooms which bids fair to become a most influential and useful institution.

It only remains that me tender you our thanks, in accepting your resignation for valuable services rendered by you for m long and continuous period, during which your enlarged views have been me less conspicuous than the generous devotion my your time and energies to the mass of education and matter progress."

On behalf of the Legal Profession, the late Mr. William Howard, Advocate General, wrote Sir Erakine Perry thus :-- "Understanding that you will not again preside in the Supreme Court, it general wish the profession is both branches, and of the Officers of Court, that I should tender you on their behalf a cordial farewell.

They with myself, view with much regret the close of a judicial career which has fur upwards of eleven years given the highest to community, attracted an increased body of suitors to the Court, and is at this very time, calling forth a testimonial to its merits of a man marked well important character.

There are many things which, speaking for myself, I might wish on this will on mexpress, but, in the organ of a body, and as representing the general feeling, allow me to say, that the minimideality you have always shown in cheapen and simplify Law Procedurs,—to facilitate the access of the poorest suitors to the Court,—to put down all barriers between your judgment and the truth and morality of each case, and to dispose of all to comprehensively as to terminate rather than give renewed life to litigation, in which I must add your readiness in all times to take in yourself any amount of judicial labour, have elicited in much the respect of the profession, as they have beyond all question secured you the lasting gratitude of the community. In this it is only necessary to add, that we am fully sensible of, and desire to acknowledge and thank you far, the general courtesy and kindness we have experienced from you during your career—and allow me, in well in my own account, in the behalf of the profession, in assure you, that in part with you with much regret, and entertain sincers wishes for your welfare and happiness in Rugland."

After retirement, Sir Perry was M. P. for Devenport, and on the constitution of the finding in 1858-59, appointed one of

JOHN LORD ELPHINSTONE, C. B., G. C. H.

My Lord,—We, the undersigned Inhabitants of Bombay, beg leave to approach your Lordship to express our respectful recognition of your able, vigorous, and constructed administration during the six pressure and half that you have the highest office in this Presidency.

As citizens of what is now, by the extent of its commerce, the Mercantile Capital of India, we view with peculiar antisfaction the reform which, under your Lordship's counsel and wise selection of instrumentality, has been effected in the Bombay Police, leading to the diminution of crime, the great security of life and property, and increased social confidence throughout this Island. We regard with interest the measures, now approaching completion, which, under the same auspices, have been adopted to obtain, though from a distance, as adequate supply for this City of the indispensable element of Water. In have been glad to learn that suitable defences for Influence and vastly increased in for the accommodation and pair of Shipping in connection with Docks and Wharfs, have engaged the attention and secured the scalous advocacy of your Lordship.

To your Lordship's warm interest in the Railway system and the extension Telegraph communication throughout India, both so essential to the maintenance and development of the British Empire in the Rast, your numerous Minutes, personal journeys to various localities, and judicious decisions have forme ample testimony. It all public works of atility, both at the Capital and throughout Provinces, your Lordship has some been the Patron and Promoter.

The constant friend of the material improvement of India, your Lordship was toverlooked its intellectual and moral advancement. The sum of public instruction, first organised by your late revered and honoured relative—the Honourable Mountstuart Elphinstone, has been much extended and considerably improved in many localities during your administration. To all educational and philanthropic institutions your Lordship has given your countenance and support. Both Teachers and Scholars have been cheered by your personal presence at Examinations and Exhibitions. Our scientific and learned Societies you have given important assistance in the matter of the promotion public lectures and antiquarian research. The valuable Government Selections of Indian Geography and Ethnography, public Economic Museum now forming, and which it is expected will bear illustrious name of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, owe very much your attention and assistance.

recognize with approbation Lordship's frequent recognition principles of religious toleration and humanity, applicable the of India, and calculated amongst them, as well as among their brethren from the far West, that good-will and hasnessy which are advancement and improvement.

eneral of your Lordship's administration has been of a healthy character: and during the continuance of that administration, increased activity and efficiency have become apparent in the different departments. It is Public Service. In your intercourse with all classes of persons under your government, your Lordship manifested unvarying politoness and urbanity, while avoiding materiatious profession and display.

The obligations under which the second Empire in the second have been brought by your Lordship during the late awful Mutiny and Rebellion, have attracted the attention of the world, and been specially acknowledged by Her Majerty and both Homes of Parliament. We, who have more nearly witnessed your Lordship's exertions in connection with the calamity to which refer, scarcely find words to express our admiration of the forethought, promptitude, judgment, courage, decision, and perseverance which your Lordship evinced in bringing succours from afar to this country; in sending relief to the threatened and suffering Provinces; in suppressing and punishing incipient mischief in our meighbourhood; in disposing the Military resources of this Presidency (applied by a Havelock, Outram, Bose, and others of immortal memory,) not only to its perfect defence, but to relling back the tide of War and the regainment of lost Territory in other quartors, to the liberation of the besieged at Lucknow, with whose fate sympathics of millions was aroused, and to the re-establishment of that Peace, for which, recognising a gracious Providence, cannot be too thankful."

Sir Jamsetji's grateful countrymen were not, however, behind hand in recognizing and publicly testifying their respect for the good qualities which distinguished this great man. In the month of June 1856, a public meeting organised by the native population of Bombay, and cordially supported by the Europeans of the city, was held in the Town Hall of Bombay under the presidency of the Governor, the Right Hon'ble Lord Elphinstone. The objects of the demonstration was to vote a Statue to the venerable Jamsetji, to be set up in the Town Hall, where the effigy of the first Native of India placed by the side of those of Elphinstone, Malcolm, and Forbes."

Guntumen,—When I maked to preside over this meeting. I felt no ordinary satisfaction in accepting in invitation. The occasion in unusual, I believe I may may, in India, unprecedented. Every one improve of the object so far, that every one must wish to do honour. Sir Jameetji Jejeebboy. Those who take an interest in the improvement and of this country, must, I think, view our proceedings today with peculiar pleasure. It is a good sign when a community comes forward of its own accord to do homoge to real worth; in honouring Sir Jameetji Jejeebboy.

I would point out that these interesting not rest solely upon the has contributed to objects of public charity and convenience.

The various benefits which he has the public benefictions alone amount to a quarter over, be permitted to observe that his public benefictions alone amount to a quarter sterling—or exactly the sum which it will take to great works which is supply this jaland with water. In what age, in in what country, can we in another example of each princely munificence? Three in the largest cities in the Britain, Glasgow, Liverpool, and Manchester—whose united population, however, in not double that of Bembay—have lately incurred, and at it moment incurring maxpense of upwards of two sterling upon water works. I will that the united wealth of three cities accords that of Bombay in the proportion that it of their water works bears to it is admit this is moriterion will, and that it is very probable that I have much underrated their superiority of wealth—but which of these cities, I ask, beast of a citizen who in devoted Bupees 25,00,000 to provide of public charity.

But have just said it is not the amount only of Jametji Jejeebhoy's charities that commands admiration. True liberality is shown in manner distribution no in the amount. I will not go back to the dark ages, with times when Christian monasteries and Buddhist wickaras were endowed by man who sought to gain the favour if Heaven by renouncing their possessions and performing what they considered in of charity, and which was certainly one abnegation. I may, however, refer to those who corrected our great collegiate institutions, the monarchs who built the literal course afforded education only who participated in the founder's former afforded education only who participated in the founder's former afforded education only soldiers sailors of the kings who established them. Far be it from me is undervalue noble foundations, but I cannot help remarking that Sir Jamestji's benefactions, with acception is believe of the Benevalent Institution, to matter community, not for Parsess only, but for Hindus, Jews, Christians, Mahomedaus.

Fire January Jeffermor, —Many and memorable have been the occasions on which the deeds of charitable and philanthropic men have been consecrated by the ancient rites and coremonies of our Masonic craft, but never have those corsmonles been comployed to aid a purpose more congenial to the feelings of the upright Mason, or the true-hearted lover of his species, than the present. The splendid structure which you here propose to dedicate to the relief of your fellow-creatures, as well in the many other transcendant acts of benevolence that have characterized your carser, are, like our Masonic limitation likely, kindred and goodly finits of the most generous emotion that can swell the boson of man towards man,—the desire to masses his brother in distruss, and to give free scope to that ever-hallowed charity,—

It with cordial sympathy, therefore, as well as with sincere gride and gratification, that the Masonic fraternity of Bombay have responded to your summons, and borne their emblems to this spot to-day. And when the record of these proceedings shall be read within the houses of our Order, dispersed throughout the civilized world, with rejoice that we have been aiding you in this good work; and will participate with us in exultation, that by far the foremost man for deeds of true wisdom in this portion of the globe, also, in giving effect to munificent designs of love and charity, been the first of tribe and country to solicit the countenance of our heatherhood.

It will be sufficient for me to repeat what has been said by the noble Lord in the chair, that he has expended, for the solid and endusing benefit of Bombay, no less than a quarter of a million sterling. But in addressing a meeting at which many of my own constrymen are present, I must not fail to alfude to the facts that, when the bones of thousands of heroic men—I uropeans and Sepoys—were whitening in the anows of Cabool, when famine decimated the Highlands of Scotland, when a

Many of those eminent individuals whose are dearest to India, have been professors and promoters of this vast system. In the Right Worshipful Brother by my side, (Sir George Anderson) you will recognize one, from whom even you have obtained encouragement; and who has, with real and fervency, devoted his gifts as a man, and his power as a Governor, the dissemination of charity and enlightenment amongst your countrymen. "That a Committee be nominated to receive subscriptions for the public for marking by some public testimental, the esteem and gratitude of public for Bartle Frere's able and successful administration of the affairs of province, during a lengthened rule of nearly nine years."

After much discussion as to the form which the testimonial should take, the proposal to erect a Half for public purposes was adopted, and setting apart a sum of Rs. 2,000 (which was in the hands of Sir Frederick Arthur, Bart., and Mr. W. P. Andrew, Chairman of the and Railway Company,) for the purchase of a piece of plate to be presented to Sir Bartle Frere when he are the public servant in India.

Designs were invited for a large Building fit to be used as a Town Hall for public purposes, to be called "The Frere Hall," and that of Captain Henry St. Clair Wilkins, R E, was approved. According to this design, alight alterations, the work was carried out, it having begun in August 1863. The total amount expended on it including municipal grants, are nearly Two Lacs of Rupees.

On the 10th October 1865, this Building was opened by Samuel field Esquire, C. S. I., then Commissioner in Sind, when he addressed the assembly as follows;—

detailed report of the proceedings connected with the construction of this building, and it is my pleasing duty ment to open it for the use of the public, we little measure for me to add to it beyond congratulating you am the completion of a Town Hall, such as is not possessed by any Municipality in Western India. I has to offer my thanks to be a successful the manufacture amountated with him on the line Committee, for the time and labour they have devoted to the supervising of building of the line. I also return to Mr. Robson who has ap well falfilled his part of the building, and I regret that a sad accident has prevented his being present on this interesting occasion.

The Municipal Commissioners in amenting to the proposal of Frere Hall Committee to associate the memory of Sir Burtle Frere's services in the Province with this Hall, and calling it by his name, have paid a graceful compliment to that man.

Sir Bartle Frere has strong convictions that improvements in manications and the construction of Irrigational works, little or no littl in the moral and physical imprevenent of the people, or in development of the country; and from the time he landed in Sind in 1851 till he left it in 1859, period of nine they ecoupled they coupled they officers in high campley country strong convictions on this subject, but few the name strong will to attain their ends. If their schemes and projects to not with approval of superior authority they come continue to make exercises; not so with Sir Partle Frere, he will brook no refunal. To use a phrase the late President of the United States, "he keeps away until agains his object." If he is refused by one authority applies another. I have heard it stated on good authority that he applied to the Bombay Government for a certain sum of money to cover the cost of the survey of a milway certain parts of Sind; and his request was refused; he then applied to the Government of India and the with a similar refusal. He afterwards addressed the Secretary of State and carried his point.

The distinguishing features in the administration of such a such a summand. He infused his own spirit into the subordinates, and public svery description according to the requirements of the country, roads, bridges, irrigational works, &c., &c., have been constructed on a scale of great magnitude and with a rapidity hitherto waknown, whereby the wealth of the people and the revenue of the Government have been increased, and the resources of the country have been greatly developed.

During his administration nearly six thousand miles of seem constructed. On mileft of the Indus near the town of Rorce, an enormous work called the "Supply Channel" has been constructed to afford a supply of water to a net-work of canals extending some three hundred miles from the point where the water Indus. The water from these canals will irrigate thousands in senses miles. and crops if indigo, sugar-case, rice, wheat, &c., will, in in course of a years, cover a country which has perhaps manus been cultivated since the creation I the world. A similar work on the right bank of the river, will the Shahadpoor Canal, is in course of construction, and will produce and same results. districts, when the denoted Heneral John Jacob pitched his tents in them, did not produce the thousand rapes they now yield three lace : when in contemplation me completed that amount me The Shikarpoor Collectorate on the right bank has become a perfect garden, and vields more than double the revenue it did when it that came into the powerion of British Government. In the Hydrahad districts wast sums have been expended in the improvement of reads. In the year 1857 when we convulsed with rebellion. Ave lace were devoted to these works under the energetic supervision Mr. Bellasis and his deputies. In every part of Inches area of Inches greatly extended, and the wealth of the people and the revenue proportionately increased,

Karachi itself is particularly indebted to Sir Burtle Frees, who supplied its great want, viz., a speedy means of communication with the interior, in exection of Government to the construction of a Railway, when I would not have been granted for many years had it not been for the margetic severance with which he pressed the matter on the notice of the authorities. Another great want of Karachi, perhaps even greater than the Railway, H s safe into its semment harbour. A few years ago a ship was wrecked outside the harbour and many lives were lost. Sir Bartle Frere took advantage of this urge upon the authorities the necessity of improving all harbour, and as seem he succeeded in carrying point. Three hundred pounds have siready been expended in the works completed, and considerable mine will be required to construct those in contemplation, and I hope that a few years hence some future Commissioner in Sind will meet you on a similar occasion as the present to colsbrate their success. I think, Ladies and Gantlemen, that you will amon with me that the Province of Sind summa a deep debt of gratitude to In the Prers. Municipal authorities have paid a very proper compliment in him by associating memory services in Sind, with Building, and calling by his name.

Lord Panmure, Secretary of State for War, in moving a vote of Marini set the Civil Service, Army, and Navy in India, and ;---

There remains men other individual connected with the civil Government of to whom I must invite your Lordships to tender your thanks—Mr. Frere, Commissioner of Sind. That gentleman's name, probably, is not so familiar to the public as those others whom I have mentioned, but it is certain there is no to whom India owes a desper debt of gratitude. As Commissioner of the reconciled the people of that province British rule, and by his prudence windom confirmed the conquest which had been achieved by the galiant Napler. He was thereby enabled to furnish aid to centre of revolt, wharever it needed; while by his prudent management maintained, during the whole this period, order and throughout the province with which he was charged.

Content with this, Mr. Frere sent down into the Northern Provinces of the Bourley Presidency half of the only European corps which remained; and afterwards, when the Moharrum, the great Mahemedan festival, approached, such me the feeling of irritation in Bombay, that he found it necessary denude Sind was of the madi samber of Europeans then with him, retaining only a ckeleton, so to speak, of the 2nd Bombay Light Infantry. Mr. Frere likewise opened a men line of postal communication between the Paujsab and Calcutta and Bombay. In found the communication between those places, via Agra, completely closed; and had he not, by dist of great exertions, re-established by line, the Panjanb would have been entirely out off from the rest of India. This, he (Viscount Falkland) thought, was no slight service; and he could not help feeling that, - he had lately seen it observed in a public print, a man who, by a own unsided exertions, held a nowly-conquered country containing 0,000,000 of inhabitants entirely by his own energy, and through the respect entertained personal character by the Natives, and his known ability and firmness, at a time when he had only 170 Europeans within the whole of that province-such a man had performed essential services to me country; and to have withheld the thanks of Parliament from him, when it was given to every me in the mess position, would have been most ungenerous and unjust.

Perhaps his task man not mandatons as man a John Lawrence, whe succeeded to a Government in which much been done before to tranquillise and settle the minds of the Natives, and to establish among the wild native tribes the blessings of a good and beneficent government, But to Mr. Frere is due the credit of having supported that system throughout. of having mulatoined his province, when a great portion of India me in a common of disturbance and revelt, in a state of entire and unbroken tranquillity; and, my Lords. permit me here to say that though the duties performed and the services rendered by those civil officers me not so brilliant and darding me those of the military service. they are not less essential to the good government of India. Mr. Frere whose name stands next in the vote, is an of two such by whom the outlying and comparatively recently acquired province of Sind has been governed with a very small display of physical force, and a comparatively limited amount of European aid. I found Bombay society in a state of considerable excitement, in consequence the approaching departure of Sir Bartle Frere and his family, on account I the exniration of his term of office. Every one was wishing to do him honour. Two remarkable events had taken place during the preceding week. One was a Bazar for the benefit of the Alexandra Girls' School, in which Lady Frere had taken a interest; it was managed chiefly by the Partees, and the young Ladies of the Parti Schools executed beautiful needlework for it. This a novel attempt, and oreded well. The other was a party given by a native Chief in honour of Mis Rxcellency the Governor; he had come to Bombay with his Lady; whom he was desirous of initiating into English civilization, while she retained her native dress and habits. She had even begun to learn English, and had been a visitor at Government House. It was intimated to her that it would be very gratifying to her European friends if she would herself receive ber visitors; she me far overcame bor native reserve that. supported by m English Lady, she joined her husband in doing the honours of the party, with as much dignity and grace if she had been born to a Court life. The Chief of Jamkhandi and wife purpose visiting - Island ere long, and will then give - opportunity of showing our appreciation of so great a triumph over ancient thraidom.

Another brilliant entertainment had been given in honour of Sir Bartle and Lady Frere by a Native gentleman, a member of the Legislative Council, the Hon'ble Mangaldas Nathubboy, at his magnificent manaion.

The English resident gentlemen who were Members of the Byculla Club gave a beautiful Ball, in their splendid lofty room, in honour of the departing Governor and his Lady, which was universally regarded as eminently successful. There was also a public dinner held there, which brought official gentlemen from distant parts of the Presidency, to show their respect to Sir Bartle Frere. The report of the dinner, in the papers of the day, showed that the speeches possessed no common interest, and that the culogiums on the Governor they were losing were not mere compliments, but sprang from the heart. What he bimself said showed that no common the existed between him and the Presidency which had been under his care. Nor was lady Frere forgotten on the occasion, but was gratefully mentioned as one who, in her own peculiar sphere, had done a most important work for the Natives, in co-operation with her husband.

The most splendid entertainment of all was, however, given by the Hon'ble A. D. Sassoon, the worthy min of that David Sassoon where name will be immertalized in this part of the world, by the many manifecent gifts be made to this country of his adoption, by the establishment of valuable Institutions. This Ball surpassed any thing I had seen or heard of. Looking down from an upper verandah on the garden, illuminated everywhere with jots of gas, one could fancy entered in a seam described in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. The illusion was heightened by the present there of the honoured mother of the host, in queenly attire, looking with profound delight on the scene, and receiving the guests with native dignity, though (as Arabia was her mother tangue, and the had never acquired English) many could not converse with her."
